

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

PUBLISHERS' NOTE TO THE AMERICAN EDITION.

THIS important English work is offered to the American public, without change or revision, in the belief that many American scholars will desire to have, for comparative reference, the dictionary which is commonly accepted in Great Britain as the standard authority upon the English language. More than ten years have been spent by the English editors in carefully revising the text of the present edition, with reference to new discoveries in philology, science, and mechanics, and in greatly augmenting the list of words and the illustrations. It is now probably the most comprehensive dictionary of the English language, and this fact, together with its encyclopædic character, gives it great value as a book of reference for specialists and the general reader.

NEW YORK, JANUARY, 1883.

THE CENTURY CO.

FROM THE PREFACE TO THE ENGLISH EDITION.

THE publication of THE IMPERIAL DICTIONARY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE, as edited by Dr. Ogilvie, was commenced in January, 1847, and completed in the year 1850; in 1854 the publication of the Supplement was begun, and it was finished the following year (1855). In this form the Imperial Dictionary was before the public for more than a quarter of a century, and was widely accepted as a standard lexicon of the English language, and as one of the most useful for the purposes of general reference and every-day requirement; the latter fact being amply attested by its continuous and steady sale over that somewhat lengthened period of years.

An important and highly useful feature which distinguished this work very much from all other English Dictionaries was the employment of pictorial illustrations in the text. The idea of using pictorial illustrations in this manner seems to have originated with the well-known dictionary of Nathan Bailey, a certain number of wood-cuts, chiefly explanatory of heraldic and mathematical terms, being inserted in the edition of his dictionary published in 1726-27 (2 vols. 8vo), while a greater number was inserted in later editions. In no previous English Dictionary, however, was this aid to the elucidation of definitions and descriptions carried into effect so thoroughly and systematically as in Ogilvie's Imperial Dictionary. In such high estimation was this new feature held that the publishers of other dictionaries, both in this country and America, have followed the same example.

But the never-ceasing process of growth, change, and expansion—to which the English, like all other living languages, is subject—having gone on with unabated rapidity since the first publication of this work, it had at length ceased to be sufficient for all requirements, more especially in a time of great intellectual activity such as the present. During the period comprising the last twenty-five or thirty years hosts of new words and terms connected with all departments of human thought and action have come into everyday use; much new light has been thrown on the etymology and history of English words, and the literature of the country has been more generally and more thoroughly studied than previously. The time, therefore, seemed fully to have arrived for bringing out the Imperial Dictionary in an improved form, and hence the appearance of the present edition, in which substantially a New Work is laid before the reader, so greatly has the book been altered and enlarged.

The most readily appreciated result of the labour bestowed upon this edition—labour continued for more than ten years—will be seen in the augmentation of the vocabulary, which has been increased by at least 30,000 words, the work being now estimated to contain about 130,000 words or separate entries—a number much greater than is contained in any English dictionary hitherto published.

The additions made to the vocabulary naturally consist largely of terms belonging to science, technology, and the arts in general; but besides these there have been inserted great numbers of words used by modern poets and prose writers, as well as by writers of all kinds from the sixteenth century to the present time, but not hitherto brought together in any one dictionary. Other additions that may be particularly mentioned are Scotch words used by Burns, Sir Walter Scott, and other writers, together with numerous provincial English words; many Americanisms; and such foreign words as are frequently met with in English books. It has been thought right to include also a large number of the colloquialisms and even slang words and phrases so freely used in modern literature of the lighter class, and frequently heard in conversation, though of course attention has been drawn to their somewhat peculiar standing and character. With a view to collecting suitable additions wherewith to enrich the vocabulary, numerous works both literary and scientific have been specially read by the editorial staff and others.

Had an increase of the number of separate entries been deemed of special importance, this result might easily have been achieved, and an appearance of greater copiousness imparted. In the first place the number of entries of compound words might have been increased by embodying many of the most obvious signification which have been omitted. It will be readily understood, however, that there is some difficulty in drawing any hard-and-fast line with regard to the insertion of words of this kind, and the tendency has rather been to inclusion than to exclusion. Again, participles are not inserted as separate words when they are merely forms of verbs, and when there is no irregularity in their formation; thus, walking, walked have no entries, but done, made, seen have. When, however, they also form adjectives, and are used in senses diverging from those of their verbs, participles are entered separately. Thus, loving is inserted as an adjective, because we speak of loving words, loving looks, &c. So verbal nouns in -ing are not entered when they express nothing more than the mere act expressed by their primitive; but when they have a concrete meaning or denote important operations (as the word engraving), they are defined in a separate article. It must also be understood that, with the exception of Chaucerian words, comparatively few words will be found in this Dictionary that are peculiar to writers before the sixteenth century (say the year 1550), the earlier period of the language not falling within its scope. To have inserted words and forms from all periods of the language would certainly have greatly increased the copiousness of the vocabulary, but at the same time the bulk and price of the work, without thereby imparting a corresponding increase of value for the vast majority of readers.

Great pains have been taken that this Dictionary shall adequately fulfil what may be called the literary functions of a dictionary. As a literary dictionary its aim is to supply a key to the written works in the language, and to serve as an aid to the use of the language itself, by registering, defining, and explaining the various meanings which are or have been attached to words by writers both new and old, by explaining idiomatic phrases and peculiar constructions, by distinguishing obsolete from current meanings and usages, as well as obsolete and obsolescent from current words, by marking whether words or meanings are poetical, colloquial, rare, provincial, and the like, and by carefully distinguishing between words closely synonymous in signification.

The words here more especially referred to are those belonging to the domain of literature as distinct from the domain of science and the arts—the words that form the bones and sinews of the English language, and give it its special character as a means for the expression of thought. All the articles on such words—comprising innumerable verbs, nouns, adjectives, adverbs, prepositions, &c.—have been thoroughly revised, and great alterations have been made on the definitions formerly given. By this process meanings similar but really different have been more clearly defined and distinguished from each other, the work has been enriched by numerous additional meanings and phrases, and greater conciseness, clearness, and precision generally have been attained; while various omissions and oversights in reference to grammatical and other peculiarities or usages have been detected and rectified. The discrimination of synonyms has been carried out on an extensive scale, and must prove a useful feature, as no doubt will also the grouping of a number of synonymous, or nearly synonymous, expressions under all the principal words.

This Dictionary will be found to be rich in illustrative quotations. Such quotations, as showing the real meanings of words and exemplifying the grammatical constructions in which they enter, are of the utmost value, and many thousands have been added in the present edition, from modern poets, novelists, historians, essayists, critics, &c., as well as from standard writers of an older date. In selecting illustrative passages preference has generally been given to such as are interesting in themselves, either from the thought conveyed or from the language in which it is clothed, and thus many of the most notable utterances of the best English writers will be found interspersed through the pages of the book. Other extracts, again, contain valuable information from trustworthy authorities on the subjects in regard to which they have been adduced.

By the encyclopædic method of treatment adopted in the work the advantages of an ordinary dictionary and those of an encyclopædia are combined. This method is the only one of real value so far as concerns a vast number of words belonging to the arts and sciences, to theology, philosophy, law, politics, manners and customs, &c., the majority of terms of this description being such that it is impossible to elucidate them satisfactorily by means of a bare definition, since such a definition, however exact in itself, often conveys little real information respecting the subject defined. For instance, under the word Steam-engine, this Dictionary does not stop short after defining it as “an engine worked by steam;” it gives a brief account of the principle, construction, and action of the steam-engine, some particulars regarding the various kinds of engines, and a succinct account of the history of this invention, and the article is illustrated by a pictorial representation of a condensing engine, having explanatory references to all the principal parts. So also with regard to Horse. To say with Dr. Johnson that it is “a neighing quadruped used in war, and draught, and carriage” is to add little or nothing to any one’s knowledge. But in this Dictionary a small article is devoted to the horse, giving some general and scientific particulars regarding the animal and its different breeds, accompanied by an engraving which explains graphically such terms as “crest,” “withers,” “pastern,” &c.

In regard to a great many words falling under this category the aid of the draughtsman and engraver has been called in to supplement the written definitions. The engraved figures, about four thousand in number, scattered over the pages of the work testify to the value of this mode of conveying information, besides adding much to the beauty of the volumes. These important advantages have not been attained without the expenditure of an amount of care, time, and labour, which a simple inspection of the figures on the pages does not render easily apparent. But when it is considered that each figure represents a fact which no invention could supply, it is at once perceived that the providing of these pictorial facts, and the research required to obtain them in such form as would really illustrate the definitions, must have entailed no ordinary amount of labour, more especially in view of the great multiplicity of subjects that had to be thus treated. The selection and arrangement of the illustrations for both the present and the former edition, have been almost exclusively the work of Mr. Robert Blackie. The replacements and new figures added in this edition extend to about one half of the whole.

While aiming at comprehensiveness and catholicity in the admission of words and terms, this Dictionary does not profess to contain all those belonging to every art and science, nor will these ever be found all collected together in any one Dictionary; yet it certainly contains far more than the generality of readers are ever likely to meet with. It will be found especially full in the departments of Zoology, Botany, Geology, Mineralogy, Mathematics, Chemistry, Physics, Astronomy, Anatomy, Medicine and Surgery, Archæology, Architecture, Engineering, Machinery, Manufactures, Agriculture, and Commerce. Among the words belonging to the department of natural history it has been thought advisable to include the Latin or semi-Latinized names of the principal orders, families, genera, &c., both of the animal and the vegetable kingdom. To secure accuracy in the definition of scientific terms, and correctness generally in the treatment of scientific subjects, the articles belonging to the various sciences have been carefully revised by men eminent for their attainments in the respective branches.

The advance that the science of comparative philology has made during the last twenty-five or thirty years, and the numerous recent investigations into the philology and history of the English language and other kindred tongues, rendered it necessary that the etymological portion of the work should be entirely remodelled. This has accordingly been done, and full use has been made of the labours of both English and foreign philologists and etymologists in effecting the requisite changes. The aim has always been to state in a concise form such facts regarding the derivations of the various words as might suffice to meet the wants of inquirers in general, and to avoid such extended treatment as could only be appreciated by persons having some special knowledge of philology. Articles on the principal prefixes and affixes will be found at their proper places registered alphabetically throughout the work, and some interesting and useful facts are given in the articles dealing with the various letters of the alphabet.

The Pronunciation has been inserted throughout according to the best usage, the words in all cases being re-spelled according to a simple and easily intelligible system of transliteration. As the pronunciation of certain words cannot be said to be settled, alternative pronunciations have been given in cases where more than one seemed to be well established. In order to meet the wants of a large number of readers, lists of Greek, Latin, Scriptural and other ancient Proper Names, and of Modern Geographical Names, with their pronunciation suitably marked have been appended, besides several other useful lists.

It is unnecessary to mention by name the various publications from which aid has been derived in bringing this Dictionary into its present form. All the most recent and important lexicographical works, as well as others of an earlier date, have contributed something of value, and great assistance has been derived from some of them, as well as from concordances, vocabularies, grammatical and other works; while in revising and drawing up the encyclopædic articles, the most recent and most trustworthy encyclopædias home and foreign, and the newest works treating of particular branches of knowledge, have been consulted.

Notwithstanding the expenditure of much care and labour, it is not to be supposed that the present work can be perfect, or even free from various errors and defects; but it is believed that the imperfections of the Imperial Dictionary will not be found more in number or greater in magnitude than might reasonably be expected to occur in an undertaking of such extent, and so difficult and so laborious in execution. The hope, indeed, may confidently be expressed that the work as a whole will, for many years, prove sufficient to meet the wants of all classes of English readers, and will rarely disappoint the expectations of those who consult its pages.

EXPLANATIONS

REGARDING PRONUNCIATION AND CHEMICAL SYMBOLS.

PRONUNCIATION.

IN showing the pronunciation the simplest and most easily understood method has been adopted, that of re-writing the word in a different form. In doing so the same letter or combination of letters is made use of for the same sound, no matter by what letter or letters the sound may be expressed in the principal word. The key by this means is greatly simplified, the reader having only to bear in mind one mark for each sound.

Vowels.

ā, as in fate.	o, as in not.
ā, " far.	ō, " move.
a, " fat.	ū, " tube.
ā, " fall.	u, " tub.
ē, " me.	ū, " bull.
e, " met.	ū, " Sc. abune (Fr. u).
ē, " her.	ol, " oil.
i, " pine.	ou, " pound.
i, " pin.	y, " Sc. fey (= e + i).
ō, " note.

Consonants.

ch, .. as in .. chain.	th, as in then.
ch, .. " .. Sc. loch, Ger. nacht.	th, " thin.
j, .. " .. job.	w, " wig.
g, .. " .. go.	wh, " whig.
h, .. " .. Fr. ton.	zh, " azure.
ng, .. " .. sing.

The application of this key to the pronunciation of foreign words can as a rule only represent approximately the true pronunciation of those words. It is applicable, however, to Latin and Greek words, as those languages are pronounced in England.

Accent.—Words consisting of more than one syllable receive an accent, as the first syllable of the word labour, the second of delay, and the third of comprehension. The accented syllable is the most prominent part of the word, being made so by means of the accent. In this dictionary it is denoted by the mark '. This mark, called an accent, is placed above and beyond the syllable which receives the accent, as in the words la'bour, de'lay, and compre'hension.

Many polysyllabic words are pronounced with two accents, the primary and the secondary accent, as the word excommunication, in which the third, as well as the fifth syllable is commonly accented. The accent on the fifth syllable is the primary, true, or tonic accent, while that on the third is a mere euphonic accent, and consists of a slight resting on the syllable to prevent indistinctness in the utterance of so many unaccented syllables. Where both accents are marked in a word, the primary accent is thus marked ", and the secondary, or inferior one, by this mark ', as in the word excommu'nica"tion.

CHEMICAL ELEMENTS AND SYMBOLS.

By means of chemical symbols, or formulas, the composition of the most complicated substances can be very easily expressed, and that, too, in a very small compass. An abbreviated expression of this kind often gives, in a single line, more information as to details than could be given in many lines of letterpress.

When any of the above symbols stands by itself it indicates one atom of the element it represents. Thus, H stands for one atom of hydrogen, O for one atom of oxygen, and Cl for one atom of chlorine. (See ATOM, and Atomic theory under ATOMIC, in Dictionary.)

When a symbol has a small figure or number underwritten, and to the right of it, such figure or number indicates the number of atoms of the element. Thus—O₂ signifies two atoms of oxygen, S₅ five atoms of sulphur, and C₁₀ ten atoms of carbon.

When two or more elements are united to form a chemical compound, their symbols are written one after the other, to indicate the compound. Thus—H₂O means water, a compound of two atoms of hydrogen and one of oxygen; C₁₂H₂₂O₁₁ indicates cane-sugar, a compound of twelve atoms of carbon, twenty-two of hydrogen, and eleven of oxygen.

These two expressions as they stand denote respectively a molecule of the substance they represent, that is, the smallest possible quantity of it capable of existing in the free state. To express several molecules a large figure is prefixed, thus: 2 H₂O represents two molecules of water, 4 (C₁₂H₂₂O₁₁) four molecules of cane-sugar.

When a compound is formed of two or more compounds the symbolical expressions for the compound are usually connected together by a comma; thus, the crystallized magnesian sulphate is MgSO₄, 7 H₂O. The symbols may also be used to express the changes which occur during chemical action, and they are then written in the form of an equation, of which one side represents the substances as they exist before the change, the other the result of the reaction. Thus, 2 H₂ + O₂ = 2 H₂O expresses the fact that two molecules of hydrogen, each containing two atoms, and one of oxygen, also containing two atoms, combine to give two molecules of water, each of them containing two atoms of hydrogen and one of oxygen.

THE IMPERIAL DICTIONARY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

A, the first letter in the English alphabet, as well as in the other alphabets derived from the Greek and Latin and ultimately from the Phœnician. As an alphabetical character it represents in English written and printed words a number of different vowel sounds, of which several at least would, in a more perfect alphabet, be represented by separate characters. Its principal sounds are those heard (1) in far, father; (2) man, cat; (3) fall, walk; (4) mate, pare. Of these sounds the first (which we may call the ah-sound) is the oldest and the one that may be said to belong most legitimately to the character, being the one also which, approximately at least, attaches to it in most other languages. This is one of those that are considered to be the three primary and original vowel sounds of the Indo-European languages, the others being i and u, pronounced as in chagrin and rule. It is, perhaps, the simplest and easiest of all the vowel sounds, being formed by a simple opening of the mouth and utterance of voice, accompanied by a gentle depression of the back part of the tongue. It is more distinctly vocal than either i or u, these latter having a close affinity with and tendency to merge into the consonantal sounds of y and w, while its vocal character is always unmistakable. It is also regarded as a stronger and more primitive sound than i and u, which, when we trace the history of words, have in a great many instances been found to arise from a weakening of an original ah-sound, while a change in the opposite direction is very rare. The other two vowels, e and o, it may be remarked are still later in character than i and u: the former comes midway between a and i if we change the position of the vocal organs gradually from that necessary for the ah-sound to that necessary for i, and in like manner o comes midway between a and u. Many English words exemplify the change of an original ah-sound to some other vowel sound, as for instance, is, do, mother, brother, kin, thin, &c., in all which the root-vowel was originally a. The ah-sound (with which may be ranked the slightly different vocal sound in fast, grant, &c.) now occurs in few English words, in far fewer certainly than in Anglo-Saxon and later, though to what extent the sound formerly prevailed is somewhat difficult to decide. In Anglo-Saxon the letter a represented at least two principal sounds, a shorter and a longer (the latter often marked with an accent). The shorter was no doubt similar in quality to the a of father, though shorter. Many words in which this sound occurred might be written indifferently with o; thus monn as well as mann, hond as well as hand, from or from, &c. The long or accented a (d, d) had no doubt the same sound as in father, though perhaps it may have also had a sound similar to our e in fall. This a often represents an older diphthongal ai seen in Gothic; thus A. Sax. hām, home—Goth. haim, G. heim; A. Sax. hlaf, a loaf—Goth. hlaf. In modern English it has most commonly passed into long e—comp. A. Sax. ādm, E. home; A. Sax. lār, E. lore; A. Sax. radā, E. road, &c. The sound of a in fall is now met with in a large number of English words, especially before i; it forms an intermediate step in pronunciation between the ah-sound in father and the o in home. The same sound is also represented by the combinations au, aw, as in vault, claw, which are only diphthongs in appearance. There is also a short sound corresponding to this, namely, that heard in what, want, quality. Intermediate between the ah-sound and the e-sound comes the sound of a in man, now one of those most commonly represented by this character. It is a comparatively modern and peculiarly English modification of the ah-sound, difficult for foreigners to acquire. In Anglo-Saxon this sound, or a sound very similar, was represented by æ, as in glæd=E. glad; bac, E. back. The same character was also frequently used to represent our short e-sound, as in A. Sax. lædde=E. led; A. Sax. læssa=E. less. It seems often to have represented a local and especially a southern modification of the fuller ah-sound, thus father, one of the few words in which the old ah-sound is still pronounced, was in the Anglo-Saxon of the south written fæder, in the north fadur, fader. This character was hardly used after the beginning of the thirteenth century, being replaced as a rule either by a with the ah-sound or by e. The a-sound (a in man) thus to some extent gave place to the ah-sound, though in modern times it has more than regained its footing. There was also a long or accented æ; it has now commonly become ee, or the same sound. Another very common sound of a is what is often called the long or name sound of the letter, that which it has namely when before a final consonant with e mute, as in mare, bare, mate, pale. Here the final e serves merely to mark the modification of the sound of the a, which thus resembles in character as in sound the German a modified (d or t). Strictly speaking the a of mare, bare, differs from that of mate, pale, the former being a pure vowel, while the latter, according to what is considered the correct pronunciation, is not a true vowel, but diphthongal in character, a slight i being heard after the a or rather e sound. These are the chief varieties of sound which this letter has to represent. Less important are the sounds heard in any, many, and the obscure sound heard in riband, and in the final a of America. Though a very common letter, a occurs as a final only in the words flea, sea, pea, plea, sea, tea, yea. Formerly (in Anglo-Saxon) it was common enough in this position. Nor is it ever doubled, in which respect it resembles i and u. This letter often stands in abbreviations, as in A.D., for anno domini (in the year of our Lord), A.B., A.M., artium baccalaureus, and artium magister, bachelor and master of arts.

A, indefinite art., the form of an used before consonants and words beginning with a consonant sound; as, a man, a woman, a year, a union, a eulogy, a oneness. This form first appears about the beginning of the thirteenth century. It is placed before nouns of the singular number, and also before plural nouns when few or great many is interposed. In such phrases as a hundred a year, a pound a head, it more clearly retains its power as a numeral, and is practically equal to the distributive pronoun each. See further under AN.

A, as a prefix, or initial and generally inseparable particle, is a relic of both Teutonic and Classical particles. 1. As a Teutonic prefix it is of very heterogeneous origin, and in particular cases there is often difficulty in determining with certainty to what older particle or particles it must be referred. It often represents prepositions, especially on, A. Sax. on, an, as in aback (A. Sax. onbæc, and also gebæc), amidst (A. Sax. on middan), asleep ('fell on sleep,' Acts xiii. 36), afloat (also on float), aboard (also on board), aloft (on loft in Chaucer), alive (on live in Chaucer), arunder (A. Sax. onrundan), &c. This is also the separable prefix a- that is prefixed to verbal nouns, as in a-hunting, a-fishing. It is doubtful, however, whether the a- in all these words directly represents the A. Sax. on; it seems rather to represent the Icel. a, on, upon, which is of course etymologically the same word (comp. Icel. a baki, aback, d lopti, aloft, d lifi, alive, &c.). Another preposition represented by it is of (A. Sax. af, a), as in adown (A. Sax. af dune), off the down or height, downwards. In a-days (in now-a-days) and in a-nights it represents an of with a somewhat different meaning. In afore it represents at (A. Sax. æfore). Prefixed to verbs it represents the A. Sax. particle a-, which was often prefixed with an intensive force, as in arise, awake, arouse, but in many cases it is difficult to discern any distinction in meaning between the compound and the simple word. The particle ge- was similarly used, and in abide, abear, the a may represent either. The initial syllable in aright, aware, &c., appears to be of the same doubtful origin. In ago, aby, the a represents the old A. Sax. particle a in another sense, namely, that of away, back. In ashamed, afeared, it represents an old intensive af. Eng. among represents the A. Sax. amang, onmang, ongemang, gemang; along represents andlang, endlong, gelang; and-here=Goth. anda, back, an-in answer.

2. As a classical or Romance prefix it represents: (a) L. ad, to; as, ascend, from ad, and scendo, to climb. (b) L. a or ab, from; as, avert, from a, and vert, to turn. (c) L. e or ex, out of; as, amend (Fr. amender, from L. emendare, compounded of e or ex, and menda, a fault). (d) Gr. a, neg. or priv.; as, amorphous, from a, not, and morphē, shape; anonymous, from a, not, and onoma, a name.

A, in music, the name of the sixth note of the model or natural diatonic scale of C: the 1a of continental musicians. It is the first note in the relative minor scale. It is the note sounded by the open second string of the violin, and to it as given by a fixed toned instrument (say the oboe or organ) all the instruments of the orchestra are tuned.

(b) To give up and forsake, as desperate or lost; as, to abandon a hopeless enterprise or a sinking ship. (c) To resign; forego; renounce; to relinquish all concern in; as, to abandon the care of empire. (d) To surrender; to give up to alien control; to yield up without restraint; as, he abandoned the city to the conqueror.—2. To outlaw; to banish; to drive out or away.

Being all this time abandoned from your bed. Shak.

3. † To reject or renounce.

Blessed shall ye be when men shall hate you and abandon your name as evil.

Luke vi. 22 (Rheims N. T.).

4. In com. to relinquish to the underwriters all claim to, as ship or goods insured, as a preliminary towards recovering for a total loss.—To abandon one's self, to yield one's self up without attempt at control or self-restraint; as, to abandon one's self to grief.—Forsake, Desert, Abandon. See under FORSAKE.—SYN. To desert, forsake, resign, forego, surrender, quit, relinquish, renounce, leave.

Abandon (a-ban'dun), n. [In first meaning borrowed directly from the French in modern times.] 1. Heartiness, the result of enthusiasm, unchecked by calculation of risks or consequences; dash; the frank, unrestrained demeanour of an impulsive temperament; as, the abandon of a champion charged with characteristic abandon; I was charmed with the abandon of her manners. [In this sense the French pronunciation (ab-an-don) is frequently retained.]—2. One who or that which is abandoned.

3. The act of giving up or relinquishing; abandonment.

These heavy exactions have occasioned an abandon of all mines but what are of the richest sort.

Lord Kames.

Abandoned (a-ban'dund), p. and a. 1. Deserted; utterly forsaken; left to destruction; as, an abandoned ship.—2. Given up, as to vice, especially to the indulgence of vicious appetites or passions; shamelessly and recklessly wicked; profligate.

Where our abandoned youth she sees, Shipwrecked in luxury and lost in ease. Prior.

—Profligate, Reprobate, Abandoned. Profligate is applied to one who throws away means and character in pursuit of vice, and conveys the idea of depravity manifested outwardly in conduct; reprobate is used with regard to one who has become insensible to reproof, who steals himself against what is good, and even glories in his wickedness; abandoned is applied to one who has recklessly cast himself loose from all moral restraint, and given himself up to the gratification of his vicious appetites.

Next age will see

A race more profligate than we. Rasselas.
And even as they did not like to retain God in their knowledge, God gave them over to a reprobate mind.

Rom. i. 28.

To be negligent of what any one thinks of you, does not only show you arrogant but abandoned.

St. Hecates.

SYN. Forsaken, deserted, destitute, forlorn, profligate, corrupt, vicious, depraved, reprobate, wicked, heinous, criminal, vile, odious, detestable.

Abandoness (a-ban'dun-s'), n. In law, one to whom anything is abandoned.

Abandoner (a-ban'dun-er), n. One who abandons.

Abandonment (a-ban'dun-ment), n. 1. The act of abandoning or state of being abandoned; absolute relinquishment; total desertion.—2. In marine insurance, the relinquishing to underwriters of all the property saved from loss by shipwreck, capture, or other peril stated in the policy, in order that the insured may be entitled to indemnification for a total loss.—3. In the customs, the giving up of an article by the importer to avoid payment of the duty.—4. In law, (a) the relinquishment to a claim or privilege. (b) The voluntary leaving of a person to whom one is bound by any particular relationship, as a wife, husband, or child; desertion.—Abandonment of railways, the giving up any scheme for making a railway and the dissolution of the company, by consent of three-fifths of the stock, and warrant of the Board of Trade.—Abandonment of an action, in Scots law, the act by which the pursuer abandons the cause. If this is done the pursuer must pay costs, but may bring a new action. Aban- donment of the action is equivalent to the English discontinuance, nolle prosequi, or non-suat, according to the stage the action has reached.

Abandun (a-band'un), n. [See ABANDON.] In old law, anything forfeited or confiscated.

Abanet (ab'-et), n. Same as Abnet.

Abaptistion (a-bap-tis'tion), n. [L.L. abaptistio.—Gr. a, priv., and baptizo, to dip.]

In every a name given to the old trepan, the crown of which was made conical to prevent it from penetrating the cranium too suddenly.

Abaret (a-bár'), v.t. [A Sax. abarisan. See BAR.] To make bare; to uncover.

Abarticulation (ab-ár-tik'-ú-lá'shon), n. [L. ab, from, and articulus, a joint.] In anat. a term used sometimes as an equivalent to diarthrosis, or a movable articulation; sometimes to synarthrosis, or an immovable articulation.

Abas (a-bas'), n. [Per. and Ar. Abbas, the ancestor of the Abasi Caliphs.] 1. A Persian coin, worth about 10d., occasionally called Abasjee.—2. An eastern weight for pearls equal to 2½ grains tr., being one-eighth less than a carat. Written also Abasai, Abasias.

Abase (a-bás'), v.t. pret. & pp. abased; ppr. abasing. [Fr. abaisser, to make low.—a, to, and baisser, to lower, from L.L. bassus, low. See BASE.] 1. To lower or depress; to throw or cast down: said of material objects. [Rare.]

His spear he 'gan abase. Spenser.

And will she yet abase her eyes on me. Shak.

2. To cast down or reduce lower, as in rank, estimation, office, and the like; to depress; to humble; to degrade.—Abase, Debase, Degradate. Abase, to humble, to make of less esteem, to bring lower in state, or cause one to feel lower; debase, to lower morally or in quality, to make unworthy or less worthy of esteem, to mingle more or less of baseness with; degrade, lit. to bring down a step, to lower one's rank; often used as an official term, but also used of lowering a man morally; as, intemperance degrades its victims; a degrading employment.

Those that walk in pride he is able to abase. Dan. iv. 37.

It is a kind of taking of God's name in vain to debase religion with such frivolous disputes.

Hooker.

O miserable man! to what fall degraded. Milton.

SYN. To depress, humble, humiliate, degrade, bring low, debase.

Abased, Abaised (a-bás'), p. and a. In her. turned downwards, as the points of the wings of eagles. Also, same as Abaisé.

Abasement (a-bás'-ment), n. The act of abasing, humbling, or bringing low; a state of depression, degradation, or humiliation.

Abash (a-bash'), v.t. [Formerly written abaisch, abaysch, &c., from O.Fr. esbahir, to astound, abash, ppr. esbahissant, from bair, bair, to gape; Mod. Fr. ébahir, to be astonished; probably from bah! exclamation of astonishment. French verbs in tr, which form the ppr. in issant, take ish in becoming English, as abolish, from abolir; ravish, from ravir; polish, from polir; &c. The verb abase would no doubt have some effect on the form of this word. The D. bazen, verbazen, to astonish, if connected with abash, would point to a different origin. Comp. abeyance, bash, bashful, bay.] To confuse or confound, as by exciting suddenly a consciousness of guilt, error, inferiority, &c.; to destroy the self-possession of; to make ashamed or dispirited; to put to confusion.—Abash, Confuse, Confound. Abash is a stronger word than confuse, but not so strong as confound. We are abashed in the presence of superiors or when detected in vice or misconduct. When we are confused the faculties get more or less beyond our control, the speech falters, and the thoughts lose their coherence. When we are confounded the reason is overpowered, a condition produced by the force of argument, testimony, or detection.

Abashed the devil stood and felt how awful goodness is. Milton.

Confused and sadly she at length replied. Pepe.

Seiza stood while as mute, confounded what to say. Milton.

SYN. To confuse, confound, disconcert, shame, daunt, overawe.

Abashment (a-bash'-ment), n. The act of abashing, or state of being abashed; confusion from shame; consternation; fear.

Which manner of abashment became her not ill. Shak.

That challenge did too peremptory seem
And did his senses with abashment greet. Spenser.

She hath abated me of half my train. Shak.

7. In metal. to reduce, as a metal, to a lower temper.

Abate (a-bát'), v.t. 1. To decrease or become less in strength or violence; as, pain abates; a storm abates.—2. To be defeated or come to naught; to fail; as, a writ abates; by the civil law a legacy to a charity does not abate by deficiency of assets.

It was still open to dispute whether it might not abate by dissolution. Hallam.

3. In law, to enter into a freehold after the death of the last occupant, and before the heir or devise takes possession.—4. In the manège, to perform well a downward motion. A horse is said to abate, or take down his curvets, when, working upon curvets, he puts both his hind legs to the ground at once, and observes the same exactness in all the times.—SYN. To subside, decrease, intermit, decline, diminish, lessen.

Abate (a-bát'), n. Abatement or decrease.

Sir T. Browne.

Abate (a-bát'), n. [It.] An abbot or abbé.

An old abate meek and mild,

My friend and teacher when a child. Longfellow.

Abatement (a-bát'-ment), n. 1. The act of abating, or the state of being abated; diminution, decrease, reduction, or mitigation; as, abatement of grief or pain.—2. The amount, quantity, or sum by which anything is abated; that by which anything is reduced; deduction; decrease.—3. In her. a mark annexed to coat armour in order to denote some dishonourable act of the party bearing the coat of arms. Nine such marks are mentioned by heralds, but no instance of their actual use is on record. The baston or baton, a mark of illegitimacy, is of the nature of an abatement.

Throwing down the stars (the nobles and senators) to the ground; putting dishonourable abatements in the fairest coats of arms. Dr. Spenser.

4. In law, (a) removal, as of a nuisance. (b) Defeat or overthrow, as of a writ. (c) The act of intruding upon a freehold vacant by the death of its former owner, and not yet taken up by the lawful heir.—Plea of abatement, a defence by which a defendant shows cause to the court why he should not be impleaded or sued, or, if impleaded or sued, not in the manner and form adopted by the plaintiff, and prays that the action or suit may abate or cease.—SYN. Decrease, decline, mitigation, reduction, subsidence, diminution, discount, deduction.

Abater (a-bát'-er), n. One who or that which abates.

Abatial (ab-ásh'-al), a. Same as Abbatial.
Abatis (ab'-a-tis), n. [L.L.—a, from, and batus, a measure.] In the middle ages, an officer of the stables who had the care of measuring out the provender; an avener.

ch, chain; ch, Sc. lock; g, go; j, job;

n, Fr. ton; ng, sing; th, then; th, thin;

w, wig; wh, whig; zh, assure.—See KEY.

Abatis. See ABATTIS.

Abat-jour (a-ba-jör), n. [Fr., from abattre (see ABATE), and jour, day, light.] A sky-light or sloping aperture made in the wall of an apartment for the admission of light.

Abator (a-bä'ter), n. One who or that which abates; specifically, in law, (a) a person who without right enters into a freehold on the death of the last possessor, before the heir or devise. (b) An agent or cause by which an abatement is procured.

Abattis, Abatis (ab-a-tis or ab'a-tis), n. [Fr. abatis, abattis, from abattre, to beat down. See ABATE.] In fort. a collection of felled trees, from which the smaller branches have been cut off, and which are laid side by side, with the branched ends turned towards assailants, and the branches often sharpened and interlaced, the butt-ends being secured by pickets, or imbedded in the earth, the whole thus forming an obstruction to the progress of the enemy, and keeping them under the fire of the defenders. An abatis is usually placed in front of the ditch in field fortifications. See FORTIFICATION.

Abattis (ab'a-tis), a. Provided with an abatis.

Abattoir (a-bat-war), n. [Fr., from abattre, to beat or knock down. See ABATE.] A public slaughter-house.

Abatide (ab'a-tid), n. [From abate.] Anything diminished. Bayley.

Abature (ab'a-tür), n. [From abate.] The mark or track of a beast of the chase on the grass; foiling.

Abat-vent (ab-a-vah), n. [Fr., from abattre, to lower, and vent, the wind.] The sloping roof of a tower; a pent-house: so named because the slope neutralizes the force of the wind.

Abat-voix (ab-a-vwa), n. [Fr., from abattre, to lower, and voix, the voice.] The sounding-board over a pulpit or rostrum: so named because it prevents the speaker's voice from rising and being lost or indistinct.

Abawse, v. t. [O. Fr. abashar, to abash. See ABASH.] To abash; to dazzle; to astonish. I was abashed for marvelle. Chaucer.

Abb (ab), n. [A. Sax. ab or ob, the woolf.] 1. Yarn for the warp in weaving.—2. The name given in sorting wool according to its fineness to two qualities of wool, called respectively coarse abb and fine abb.

Abba (ab'ba), n. [Syr. and Chal. abba, father. The root is in the Heb. ab, a father, which appears in Abraham.] A title (equivalent to 'Father') now or formerly applied, especially in the Eastern church, to monks, superiors of monks, and other ecclesiastics. In the Syriac, Coptic, and Ethiopic Churches it is given to the bishops, who in turn bestow it, by way of distinction, on the bishop or patriarch of Alexandria.

Abbacinate (ab-ba'in-ät), v. t. [It. abbacinare, to abbasinate—ad, to, and basino, a basin.] To deprive of sight by applying a red-hot copper basin close to the eyes: a mode of punishment employed in the middle ages.

Abbasination (ab-ba'sin-ä'shon), n. The act or process of blinding a person by placing a red-hot copper basin close to the eyes.

Abbacy (ab'ba-si), n. [L. abbatia, an abbey, from L. abbas, abbatis, an abbot. See ABBOT.] The dignity, rights, and privileges of an abbot.

According to Felinus, an abbacy is the dignity itself, since an abbot is a term or word of dignity, and not of office. Ayliffe.

Abba-jeer (ab'ba-jër), n. See ABBAS, 1.

Abbandonamento (ab-ban'don-ä-men'to), adv. [It.] In music, with self-abandonment; so as to make the time subservient to the expression.

Abbat (ab'bat), n. Same as Abbot.

Abbatial, Abbatial (ab-bat'ik-al, ab-bä'shi-al), a. Belonging to an abbey.

Abbé (ab-bé), n. [Fr., an abbot, from Syr. and Chal. abba, father. See ABBA.] In France, an abbot; but more generally, and especially before the French revolution, a title given to all those Frenchmen who devoted themselves to divinity, or who had at least pursued a course of study in a theological seminary, in the hope that the king would confer on them a real abbey, that is, a certain part of the revenues of a monastery. The abbés were numerous. Some acted as private tutors in families, others were professors of the university, and a great many employed themselves as men of letters. The name is also applied to persons holding a similar semi-clerical position in other Roman Catholic countries.—Abbes commendataires were such abbés as held abbies in commendam—that is, with the right of administering their revenues or a part of them. See ABBOT.

Abbess (ab'bes), n. [Fr. abbesse, L. abbatissa, fem. of abbot (which see).] A female superior or governess of a nunnery or convent of nuns. An abbess in the Roman Catholic Church possesses, in general, the same dignity and authority as an abbot, except that she cannot exercise the spiritual functions appertaining to the priesthood. See ABBOT.

Abbey (ab'bé), n. [Fr. abbaye, from L. abbatia, an abbey. See ABBE.] 1. A monastery or convent; a society of persons of either sex, secluded from the world, and devoted to religion and celibacy. The males are called monks, and governed by an abbot; the females are called nuns, and governed by an abbess. Abbays differ in nothing from priories, except that the latter are governed by priors instead of abbots.—2. In Scotland, the sanctuary afforded by the abbey of Holyrood Palace, as having been a royal residence.—3. A house adjoining a monastery or convent for the residence of the superior.—4. A church attached to a monastery or convent; as, Melrose Abbey.—5. In the early times of the French monarchy, a name given to a duchy or county, the duke or count of which was, though really a secular person, made an abbot in commendam, in consequence of an abbey having been conferred on him by the crown. See ABBOT.—6. A mansion, formerly used as an abbey, now converted to private use; as, Newstead Abbey, the residence of Lord Byron.

Abbey-land (ab'bé-land), n. An estate in land annexed to an abbey.

Abbey-lubber (ab'bé-lub'er), n. [Abbey and lubber.] An old term of contempt for an idle, well-fed, lazy loiterer, who might work, but would not, preferring to depend on the charity of religious houses; frequently applied to the monks themselves in contempt. 'This is no huge, over-grown, abbey-lubber.' Dryden.

Abbot (ab'but), n. [Formerly abbat, L. abbas, abbatis. See ABBA.] 1. Lit. father; a title originally given to any aged monk, but afterwards limited to the head or superior of a monastery, which from him was called an abbey. As the influence of the religious orders became greater from their being the depositories of learning, and as their wealth and territorial possessions increased, the power and dignity of the abbots were aggrandized proportionally. Many of them asserted independence of the bishops, assumed the mitre and crozier, exercised the episcopal functions in their own domains, became peers of the realm, and rivalled the prelates in rank and pomp. In the reign of Henry VIII. twenty-six mitred abbots sat in the House of Lords. Abbots are of two kinds, regular, or those who actually discharge the duties of the office, and commendatory. The latter title was formerly given to persons to whom abbays were intrusted as tutors or trustees, or in commendam, and who applied the whole or part of the revenues to their own uses. Great secular lords frequently received this appointment. Thus Hugo Capet, the founder of the Capetian dynasty, was Abbot of St. Denis. Such abbots were by canon law bound to have received the tonsure, and to enter orders on attaining canonical age, but the obligation was easily evaded.—2. A title formerly given to the chief magistrates of some communities or states, as in Genoa.—Abbot of Mirville, in England, Abbot of Unreason, in Scotland, the personage who took the principal part in the Christmas revels of the populace before the Reformation.

Abbotship (ab-but-ship), n. The state or office of an abbot.

Abbreviate (ab-bré-vi-ät), v. t. pret. & pp. abbreviated; ppr. abbreviating. [L. abbrevio, abbreviatum, to shorten—ab, from, and brevis, short. See BRIEF, and ABRIDGE (which is really the same word).] 1. To make briefer; to shorten; to abridge; to make shorter by contraction or omission of a part; to reduce to a smaller compass; as, to abbreviate a writing or word.—2. In math. to reduce to the lowest terms, as fractions.

Abbreviate (ab-bré-vi-ät), v. i. To practise or use abbreviation.

It is one thing to abbreviate by contracting, another by cutting off.

Abbreviate (ab-bré-vi-ät), n. An abridgment.—Abbreviate of adjudication, in Scots law, an abstract of adjudication. See ADJUDICATION.

Abbreviate (ab-bré-vi-ät), a. In bot. abbreviated; applied to an organ or part of an organ shorter than a contiguous one.

Abbreviation (ab-bré-vi-ä'shon), n. 1. The act of abbreviating, shortening, or contracting, or the state of being abbreviated. 2. That which is abbreviated, as a short term or title used for a longer one; a syllable, generally the initial syllable, used for the whole word; a letter, or a series of letters, standing for a word or words; as, seq. for sequere; F.R.S. for Fellow of the Royal Society; A.D. for Anno Domini.

This book, as graver authors say, was called Liber Domus Dei, and, by abbreviation, Domus Dei. Sir W. Temple.

3. In math. a reduction of fractions to the lowest terms.—4. In music, a sloping line or Written. Played. lines placed below a note or through its stem to indicate that it is to be divided into a corresponding number of short notes. Thus, a minim carrying one line is played as four quavers, or carrying two lines as eight quavers. The same line-mark, standing alone, indicates a repetition of the preceding group of notes. Abbreviation, Contraction. An abbreviation of a word, as distinguished from contraction, is strictly a part of it, generally the first syllable, taken for the whole, with no indication of the remaining portion; as, Gen. for Genesis; math. for mathematics; Will. for William, while a contraction properly is made by the elision of certain letters or syllables from the body of the word, but in such a manner as to indicate the whole word; as, Recd. pay. for Received payment; contd. for continued or continued; Wm. for William. In common usage, however, this distinction is not always attended to.

Abbreviator (ab-bré-vi-ä-tär), n. [In first sense from the verb; in second from L. abbreviator, one of the officials mentioned under 2.] 1. One who abbreviates, abridges, or reduces to a smaller compass; specifically, one who abridges what has been written by another. 'Neither the archbishop nor his abbreviator.' Sir W. Hamilton.—2. One of a college of seventy-two persons in the chancery of the Roman Catholic pontiff, whose business is to draw up the pope's briefs, and reduce the petitions, when granted, to a suitable form for bulls.

Abbreviatory (ab-bré-vi-ä-tö-ri), a. Abbreviating or tending to abbreviate; shortening; contracting.

Abbreviature† (ab-bré-vi-ä-tür), n. 1. A letter or character used for shortening; an abbreviation.

The hand of Providence writes often by abbreviations, hieroglyphics, or short characters. Sir T. Browne.

2. An abridgment; a compendium.

This is an excellent abbreviature of the whole duty of a Christian. Jer. Taylor.

Abbroach,† Abbroch† (ab-bröch'), v. i. [L. abbrocamentum, buying wholesale and selling by retail, from same root as E. broke, broker.] To forestall the market or monopolize goods.

Abbroachment,† Abbroachment† (ab-bröch'ment), n. The act of forestalling the market or monopolizing goods. See under FORESTALL.

Abb-wool (ab-wul), n. 1. Wool for the abb or warp of a web.—2. A variety of wool of a certain fineness. See ABB.

A, b, c. 1. The first three letters of the alphabet, used generally for the whole; as, the child is learning his A, b, c.—2. A little book for teaching the elements of reading. Called also an A, b, c book.

Abd (abd), n. [Ar., a slave, servant.] A common prefix in Arabic names of persons; as Abdallah, servant of God; Abd-ul-Kader, servant of the mighty God; Abd-ul-Latif, servant of the gracious God; &c.

Abdal (ab-dal), n. [Ar. Abdallah, a servant of God.] A dervish; one of a class of Persian religious devotees.

Abdalavi, Abdalavi (ab-dal-ä-vi, ab-del-ä-vi), n. The native name of the hairy cucumber of Egypt (Cucumis Chate).

Abderian (ab-dér'i-an), a. [From Abdera, in Thrace, the birthplace of Democritus called the Laughing Philosopher, whence the application of the term.] Pertaining to Abdera or its inhabitants; resembling or recalling in some way the philosopher Democritus of Abdera; hence, a term applied to incessant or continued laughter; given to laughter.

Abderite (ab-dér-it), n. [L. abderita, Gr. Abderites.] An inhabitant of Abdera, a maritime town in Thrace, and sometimes a term equivalent to a stupid person, the inhabitants of this city being anciently proverbial for their stupidity.—The Abderite, Democritus of Abdera, often called the Laughing Philosopher, one of the most celebrated philosophers among the ancient Greeks.

Abdest (ab'dest), n. [Per. abdest—ab, water, and dast, hand.] Purification or ablution before prayer; a Mohammedan rite.

Abdevanham (ab-dev'n-ham), n. In astrology, the head of the twelfth house in a scheme of the heavens.

Abdicant (ab'di-kant), n. One who abdicates. Abdicant (ab'di-kant), a. [See ABDICATE.] Abdicating; renouncing.

Monks abdicant of their orders. Whitlock.

Abdicato (ab'di-kát), v.t. pret. & pp. abdicated; ppr. abdicating. [L. abdicco, abdicatum, to give up a right or claim—ab, indicating separation, and dicco, dicare, to declare publicly, to consecrate, to set apart, of same root as dicere, to say.] 1. To give up, renounce, abandon, lay down, or withdraw from, as a right or claim, office, duties, dignity, authority, and the like, especially in a voluntary, public, or formal manner.

The father will disinherit or abdicato that power he hath rather than suffer it to be forced to a willing injustice. Burton.

The cross-bearers abdicato their service. Gibbon.

He [Charles II.] was utterly without ambition. He devoted business, and would sooner have abdicato his crown than have undergone the trouble of really directing the administration. Macaulay.

Heros and Lazarus, the Gallic bishops, were denounced . . . as vagabond, turbulent, and intriguing prelates, who had either abdicato or abandoned their sees, and travelled about sowing strife and calumny wherever they went. Milman.

2. To cast away; to take leave of; as, to abdicato one's mental faculties. [Rare or obsolete.]—3. In civil law, to disclaim and expel from a family, as a child; to disinherit during lifetime: said of a father.

The father will disinherit or abdicato his child, quite cashier him. Burton.

4. To put away or expel; to banish; to renounce the authority of; to dethrone; to degrade.

Scaliger would needs turn down Homer, and abdicato him after the possession of three thousand years. Dryden.

5. To give up, quit, vacate, relinquish, forsake, abandon, resign, renounce, desert. Abdicato (ab'di-kát), v.t. To renounce or give up something; to abandon some claim; to relinquish a right, power, or trust.

He cannot abdicato for his children, otherwise than by his own consent in form to a bill from the two houses. Swif.

Abdication (ab-di-ká'hon), n. The act of abdicating; the abandonment of an office, power or authority, right or trust; a casting off; renunciation: generally applied to giving up the kingly office.

The consequences drawn from these facts (were) that they amounted to an abdication of the government, which abdication did not only affect the person of the king himself, but also of all his heirs, and rendered the throne absolutely and completely vacant. Blackstone.

Abdication (ab'di-kát-iv), a. Causing or implying abdication. Bailey. [Rare.] Abdicator (ab'di-kát-ér), n. One who abdicates.

Abditiv (ab'di-tiv), a. [L. abdo, abditum, to hide—ab, away, and do, to give.] Having the power or quality of hiding. [Rare.] Abditory (ab'di-tó-ri), n. [L. abditorium, from abdo. See ABDITIVE.] A place for hiding or preserving goods, plate, or money; a chest in which relics were kept.

Abdomen (ab-dó-men or ab'dó-men), n. [L., probably from abdo, to conceal, on type of ascum from ascus, and foramen from fora.] 1. That part of the human body which lies between the thorax and the pelvis. It is lined with a membrane called the peritoneum, and contains the stomach, liver, spleen, pancreas, kidneys, bladder, and intestines. It is separated from the breast internally by the diaphragm, and externally by the lower ribs.

On its outer surface it is divided into certain defined portions called regions. The term is also sometimes applied to the belly of the lower animals. See Abdominal Regions under ABDOMINAL.—2. In entomology, the posterior of the three parts of the perfect insect, united to the thorax by a slender connecting portion, and containing the greater portion of the digestive apparatus. It is divided into rings or segments, on the sides of which are small spiracles, or stigmata, for respiration.

Abdominal (ab-dom'in-al), a. 1. Pertaining to the abdomen or belly.—Abdominal regions, certain regions into which the abdomen in men is arbitrarily divided. An imaginary line (a a) is drawn transversely from the cartilage of the seventh rib on one side to the corresponding point of the opposite side, and another transverse line (b b) between the anterior superior spines of the ilia. The part above the upper line is called the epigastric region, that between the upper and lower lines the umbilical region, and that beneath the lower line the hypogastric region. These regions are sometimes subdivided by two vertical lines (c c), one being drawn on each side, from the cartilage of the seventh rib to the anterior superior spine of the ilium. The central portion of the epigastric region (1) retains the name of epigastric; the lateral portions (4, 4) are called the right and left hypocondriac regions; the middle part of the umbilical region (2) is still called umbilical, while the parts to the right and left (5, 5) are called lumbar; the hypogastric region is denominated pubic in its central portion (3), and is divided on each side (6, 6) into an iliac and inguinal region. The latter, however, belongs in strictness to the thigh. Posteriorly there are two regions recognized on either side of the backbone—the upper, corresponding to the hypocondriac, being called the inferior dorsal; the lower, the lumbar.—Abdominal ring, an oblong tendinous ring in both groins, through which pass the spermatic cord in men, and the round ligaments of the uterus in women. Called also Inguinal Ring.—2. In ichthyology, having ventral fins posterior to the pectoral; as, an abdominal fish.

Abdominal Regions.

Abdominal (ab-dom'in-al), n. One of a group of malacopterygian fishes, with the ventral fins posterior to the pectorals, including many fresh-water fishes, and others which periodically leave the sea to spawn in fresh water. Many species are edible. The salmon, parr, mullet, flying-fish, herring, and carp belong to this order.

Abdominales, Abdominales (ab-dom-i-ná-léz, ab-dom-i-ná'l-i-a), n. pl. A group of malacopterygian fishes. See ABDOMINAL, n. Abdominoscopy (ab-dom'in-os'kó-pi), n. [L. abdomen, and Gr. skopeo, to view or examine.] In med., examination of the abdomen with a view to detect disease.

Abdominous (ab-dom'in-us), a. 1. Of or pertaining to the abdomen.—2. Having a large belly; pot-bellied. [Rare.] Gorgonius sits abdominous and wan, Like a fat squab upon a Chinese fan. Crowper.

Abduce (ab-dús), v.t. pret. & pp. abduced; ppr. abducting. [L. abduco, to lead away—ab, and duco, to lead, to draw. See DUCE.] To draw or conduct away; to withdraw or draw to a different part.

If we abduce the eye into either corner, the object will not duplicate. Sir T. Brown.

Abducent (ab-dús'ent), a. [L. abducens, abducens, ppr. of abduco, to abduce.] Drawing away; pulling back; specifically, in anat., applied to those muscles which pull back certain parts of the body from the mesial line, in contradistinction to the adduct muscles or adductors.

Abduct (ab-duk't), v.t. 1. Same as Abduce. 2. To take away surreptitiously and by force.

The thing is self-evident, that his majesty has been abducted or spirited away, 'enlevé,' by some person or persons unknown. Carlyle.

Abduction (ab-duk'hon), n. [L. L. abductio, abductio, a leading or drawing away. See ABDUCE.] 1. The act of abducting or abducting, or state of being abducted or abducted. 2. In physiology, the action by which muscles withdraw a limb or other part from the axis of the body, as when certain muscles separate the arm from the side or the thumb from the rest of the fingers.—3. In surgery, a term formerly applied to a fracture in which the bone near a joint is so divided that the extremities recede from each other.—4. In logic, a kind of syllogism, called by the Greeks apagoge, in which the major is evident, but the minor is not so clear as not to require further proof, as in this syllogism: 'All whom God absolves are free from sin: God absolves all who are in Christ; therefore all who are in Christ are free from sin.' This mode of reasoning is called abduction, because it withdraws us from the conclusion to the proof of a proposition concealed or not expressed. Fleming, Vocab. of Philos. 5. In law, the fraudulent or unlawful leading away of a person, more especially the taking and carrying away of a child, a ward, a wife, &c., either by fraud, persuasion, or open violence. The term is most commonly applied to the taking away of females. The term is also applied to the using of force to prevent a voter from voting in an election.

Abductor (ab-duk'tér), n. One who or that which abducts; specifically, in anat., a muscle which moves certain parts from the axis of the body; as, the abductor oculi, a muscle which pulls the eye outward: opposed to adductor.

Abeam (a-bém), adv. [Prefix a, on, and beam.] Naut. on the beam, that is, at right angles to the keel of a ship; thus guns are said to be pointed abeam when they are pointed in a line at right angles to the ship's keel.

Abear (a-bár), v.t. [A Sax. abearan, to bear, to carry, to suffer, from prefix a, and beran, to carry.] 1. To bear; to behave: with reflexive pronoun.

Thus did the gentle knight himself abear. Spenser. 2. To suffer or tolerate. [Provincial or vulgar.]

Cin I mun doy I mun doy, for I coulda abear to see it. Townson (Northern Farmer).

Abearance (a-bár'ans), n. [From abear (which see).] Behaviour; demeanour.

The other species of recognisances with sureties is for the good abearance or good behaviour. Blackstone.

Abecedarian (á-bé-sé-dá'ri-an), n. [A word formed from the first four letters of the alphabet.] 1. One who teaches the letters of the alphabet, or a learner of the letters. 2. A follower of Stork, an Anabaptist, in the sixteenth century, so called because he rejected all worldly knowledge, even the learning of the alphabet.

Abecedarian, Abecedary (á-bé-sé-dá'ri-an, á-bé-sé-dá-ri), a. Pertaining to or formed by the letters of the alphabet.—Abecedarian psalms, hymns, &c., psalms, hymns, &c., in which (as in the 119th psalm), distinct portions have the verses begin with successive letters of the alphabet.

Abeche, v.t. [O. Fr. abécher; Fr. abéquer, abéquer, to feed with the beak, to feed an infant—a, and bec, the beak.] To feed, as a parent bird feeds its young.

Yet should I someday ben abeched, And for the time well refreshed. Gower.

Abed (a-bed'), adv. [Prefix a, on, and bed.] 1. On or in bed.

Not to be abed after midnight is to be up betimes. Shak.

2. To bed.

Her mother dream'd before she was deliver'd That she was brought abed of a buzzard. Brow & Fl.

Abee (a-bé') [Scotch.] Used in the same sense as be.—To let abee, to let alone; to let be.—Let abee is used as a noun in the sense of forbearance or connivance.—Let abee for let abee, one act of forbearance meeting another; mutual forbearance.

I am for let abee for let abee. Sir W. Scott.

—Let abee (adv.), far less; not to mention; as, he couldna let abee stand.

Abegge, v.t. [See ABY.] To suffer for, or atone for; to atone.

There dorste no wight hold upon him legges, That he ne swore he shuld anon abegge. Chaucer.

Abeigh (a-bé'h), adv. [O. Fr. abbay, abbai, Fr. abbas, the bark of a dog; tenir en abbay, to hold at bay, from baer, baire, to gape. See ABASH, BAY. [Scotch.] Aloof; at a shy distance.—To stand abash, to keep aloof.

Maggie coost her head fu' high,
Look'd askint and unco skeigh,
Gart poor Duncan stand abash—
Ha, ha, the wooing o' Burns.

Abels Abel-tree (a-bél' 'á-bel-tré) n. [G. abels alber; M.H.G. alber; O.H.G. albari; D. abel; Fr. aubel, aubelle, perhaps from L. abellus, whitish, or from L. arbor, it, albero, a tree.] The white poplar (Populus alba), so called from the white colour of its twigs and leaves. See POPLAR.

Abelian (á-bé'lyan), a. Of or pertaining to the mathematician Abel.—Abelian equation, an irreducible algebraic equation, one of whose roots is inexpressible as a rational function of a second, and shown by Abel to be solvable by the solution of a second equation of a lower degree.—Abelian functions, inverse Abelian integrals, analogous to functions of the amplitude of an ordinary elliptic integral, and also to inverse circular and logarithmic functions; as, \sin , \cos , \log , \log .—Abelian integrals, a class of ultra-elliptic integrals first investigated by Abel.

Abelian (á-bé'lyan), n. A member of a sect in Africa which arose in the fourth century. They married, but lived in continence, after the manner, as they maintained, of Abel, and attempted to keep up the sect by adopting the children of others. Also called Abelonian and Abelitic.

Abelmoschus, Abelmosk (á-bel-mos'kua, á-bel-mosk) n. [Ar. habb-al-mosk, seed of musk, or abu-al-mosk, father of musk, that is, endowed with musk.] A genus of plants nat. order Malvaceae. A. moschatus, or Hibiscus abelmoschus, is an evergreen shrub of tropical Asia and America, 3 feet high. The seeds have a musky odour, for which reason the Arabs mix them with coffee. A. esculentus is an Indian annual, 4 feet high, variously called ochro, bandakut, gombo, &c. It yields a much esteemed mucilaginous fruit, used in soups and pickles in the W. Indies, Isle of France, &c. All the species yield good fibre.

Abel-tree. See ABEL.

A bene placito (á-bá'ná plach'á-tó). [It.] In music, at pleasure; indicating that a piece is to be played in the way the performer likes best.

Aber (á-ber), n. [Cym. and Pictish equivalent of Gael. inver. There are three Welsh forms to denote meeting of waters—aber, ynver, cynver, compounded of cym=L. con, together, and ber, flowing, seen in berad, a running of water; Armor berri, to flow. Cumry, Cymry, Cumberland, Cumbræ, Humder, exhibit the word under various forms. See CYMRY, INVER.] A Celtic word prefixed to the names of many places in Great Britain, and signifying a confluence of waters, either of two rivers, or of a river with the sea; as, Aberdeen, Aberdour, Abergavenny, Aberystwith.

Aberdevine (á-ber-de-vín), n. The Fringilla spinus or siskin, a well-known song-bird, belonging to the finch family (Fringillidae), somewhat resembling the green variety of the canary bird. It is a native of Scandinavia, visiting Britain in autumn and winter.

Aber (á-ber), v.i. To wander; to err. Sir T. Browne. [Rare.]

Aberrance, Aberrancy (ab-er-rans, ab-er-á-n), n. [L. aberro, to wander from—ab, and erro, to wander.] A wandering or deviating from the right way; a deviation from truth or rectitude. Sir T. Browne. [Rare.]

Aberrant (ab-er-rant), a. [L. aberrans, pp. of aberro, to wander.] 1. Wandering, straying from the right way.—2. In zool. and bot. applied to certain animals and plants which differ materially from the type of their natural group.

The more aberrant any form is, the greater must have been the number of connecting forms, which on my theory have been exterminated or utterly lost.

Darwin.

Aberrate (ab-er-rát), v.i. [L. aberro, aberratum (ab and erro), to wander from.] To wander or deviate from the right way. [Rare.]

The product of their defective and aberrating vision.

De Quincy.

Aberration (ab-er-rá-shon), n. [L. aberratio, from aberro, aberratum—ab, from, erro, to wander.] 1. The act of wandering from; especially, in a figurative sense, the act of wandering from the right way; deviation from truth or moral rectitude; deviation from a type or standard.

So then we draw near to God, when, repenting us of our former aberrations from him, we renew our covenants with him.

Bp. Hall.

2. In astron. the difference between the true and the observed position of a heavenly body, the result of the combined effect of the motion of light and the motion of the eye of the observer caused by the annual or diurnal motion of the earth, or of the motion of light and that of the body from which the light proceeds; when the auxiliary cause is the annual revolution of the earth round the sun, it is called annual aberration, in consequence of which a fixed star may appear as much as 20" 4 from its true position; when the auxiliary cause is the diurnal rotation of the earth on its axis, it is called diurnal aberration, which amounts at the greatest to 0" 3; and when the auxiliary cause is the motion of the body from which the light proceeds, it is called planetary aberration.—3. In optics, a deviation in the rays of light when unequally refracted by a lens, or reflected by a mirror, so that they do not converge and meet in a point or focus, but spread out, forming an indistinct and coloured image of the object. It is called spherical when the imperfection arises from the form of curvature of the lens or reflector, and chromatic when it arises from the different refrangibility of the rays composing white light, the image of the object being surrounded with prismatic colours. In the former case it produces distortion, and in the latter false colour of the object. In the eye the iris and crystalline lens prevent these aberrations. Optical instruments corrected for chromatic aberration are called achromatic.—4. In physiol. the passage of a fluid in the living body into vessels not destined to receive it, as also the determination of a fluid to an organ different from that to which it is ordinarily directed, as in vicarious hemorrhage.—5. In zool. and bot. deviation of a plant or animal from the type of its natural group.

In whichever light, therefore, insect aberration is viewed by us . . . we affirm that it does . . . exist.

T. V. Wollaston.

6. Partial alienation of mind; mental wandering.—Circle of aberration, the circle of coloured light observed in experiments with convex lenses between the point where the violet rays and that where the red rays meet.—Crown of aberration, a luminous circle surrounding the disc of the sun depending on the aberration of its rays, by which its apparent diameter is enlarged.

Aberruncate (ab-er-rung-kát), v.t. [Prefix ab, and L. eruncio, to weed out—e, out, and runcio, to weed.] To pull up by the roots; to extirpate utterly. Bailey.

Aberruncator (ab-er-rung-kát-ér), n. An implement for extirpating weeds; a weeder or weeding-machine.

Abet (a-bet'), v.t. pret. & pp. abetted; ppr. abetting. [O.Fr. abetter, abetor, to incite, to lure, to deceive, to befool; O.Fr. abet, decelt; Norm. abet, a bait—prefix a, and root of bait, to incite, set on. See BAIT.] 1. To encourage by aid, countenance, or approval: used chiefly in a bad sense, and always with a personal object.

They abetted both parties in the civil war, and always furnished supplies to the weaker side, lest there should be an end put to these fatal divisions.

2. To maintain; to support; to uphold: in this sense sometimes with a thing for the object.

Then shall I soon, gooth he, . . . Abet that virgin's cause disconsolate. Spenser.

3. In law, to encourage, counsel, incite, or assist in a criminal act. In Scots law, a person is said to be abetting though he may only protect a criminal, conceal him from justice, or aid him in making his escape. Hence—4. To lead to or encourage the commission of.

Would not the fool abet the stealth Who rashly thus exposed his wealth? Gay.

Syn. To aid, assist, support, encourage, sustain, back, connive at.

Abet (a-bet'), n. The act of aiding or encouraging, especially in a crime. Chaucer.

Abetment (a-bet'ment), n. The act of abetting.

Abettal (a-bet'al), n. Act of abetting; aid.

Abettal. [Rare.]

Abettor, Abettor (a-bet'ér), n. 1. One who abets or incites; one who aids or encourages another to commit a crime; a supporter or encourager of something bad.

But let th' abettors of the panther's crime Learn to make fairer wars another time. Dryden.

[In law, an abettor, as distinguished from an accessory, is more especially one who being present gives aid or encouragement.]

2. One who aids or encourages: in a good sense. Pope.

Ab evacuation (ab-é-vak'ú-é'-shon), n. [L. ab and E. evacuation.] In med. (a) a partial evacuation. (b) An immoderate evacuation.

Ab extra (ab ek'stra). [L.] From without.

Abeyance (a-bé'ans), n. [Norm. Fr. abbes-ance, abbaziance, expectation, from ab-bayer, to listen with the mouth open, from bayer, baer, baïr, to gape, as in crying ba! See ABASH.] 1. In law, a state of expectation or contemplation; thus, the fee simple or inheritance of lands and tenements is in abeyance when there is no person in being in whom it can vest, so that it is in a state of expectancy or waiting until a proper person shall appear. If, for instance, land is leased to a man for life, remainder to another for years, the remainder for years is in abeyance till the death of the lessee for life. Titles of honour and dignities are said to be in abeyance when it is uncertain who shall enjoy them, as when a nobleman holding his dignity descends to his heirs general dies leaving daughters, the king by his prerogative may grant the dignity to which of the daughters he pleases, or on the male issue of one of such daughters. During the time the title to the dignity is thus in suspension it is said to be in abeyance.—2. A state of suspension or temporary want of exercise.

There is such a thing as keeping the sympathies of love and admiration in a dormant state, or state of abeyance. De Quincy.

Abeyant (a-bé'ant), a. In law, being in abeyance.

Abgregate† (ab-gré-gát), v.t. [L. abgrego, to lead away from the flock—ab, away, and grego, gregis, a flock.] To separate from a herd.

Abhal (ab-hal), n. A name given in the East Indies to the berries of a species of cypress or juniper which are believed to be a powerful emmenagogue. Written sometimes Ab-hal.

Abhominable (ab-hom'in-a-bl), a. An old mode of spelling abominable (from its being supposed to be derived from ab homine, from or repugnant to man), ridiculed as pedantic by Shakspeare in the character of the pedant Holofernes.

This is abhominable which he would call abominable. Lord's Labourer's Lost.

Abhor (ab-hor'), v.t. pret. & pp. abhorred; ppr. abhorring. [L. abhorreo, to shrink back—ab, from, and horreo, to shudder, to feel horror.] 1. To hate extremely or with loathing; to loathe, detest, or abominate; to feel excessive repugnance towards; to shrink from with horror.

Therefore I say again,
I utterly abhor, yea, from my soul,
Refuse you for my judge. Shak.

Thou didst not abhor the virgin's womb. Te Deum.

2. To fill with horror and loathing. [Rare.]

It doth abhor me now I speak the word. Shak.

—Hate, Abhor, Detest. See under HATE.

Abhor† (ab-hor'), v.t. 1. To shrink back with disgust, or fear, and shuddering. 'To abhor from those voices.' Udall.—2. To be inconsistent with, oppose or contrary to: followed by from.

Which is utterly abhorring from the end of all law. Milton.

Abhorred (ab-hor'd), p. and a. Hated extremely; detested; as, no one is more abhorred.

Abhorrence (ab-hor'rens), n. Extreme hatred; detestation; great aversion.

Abhorrecy† (ab-hor'ren-si), n. Abhorrence.

The first tendency to any injustice . . . must be suppressed with a show of wonder and abhorrecy in the parents.

Abhorrent (ab-hor'rent), a. 1. Hating; detesting; struck with abhorrence.

The arts of pleasure in despotic courts I spurn abhorrent. Clower.

2. Contrary; utterly repugnant; violently inconsistent with: formerly with from, now with to.

This legal, and as it should seem injudicious profanation, so abhorrent to our stricter principles, was received with a very faint murmur. Cribben.

Abhorrently (ab-hor'rent-li), adv. With abhorrence.

Abhorrer (ab-hor'é-r), n. One who abhors: specifically, in the reign of Charles II., a member of the court party, afterwards called Tories. They derived their name from their professed abhorrence of the principles of the Addressers, who endeavoured to encroach on the royal prerogative. See ADDRESSERS.

Great numbers of abhorrents, from all parts of England, were seized by order of the Commons, and committed to custody. Hume.

Abhorrible (ab-hor'ri-bl), a. Worthy or deserving to be abhorred. [Rare.]

Abib (a-bib), n. [Heb. abib, an ear of corn, from abab, to produce the first or early fruit—root ab, a swelling.] The first month of the Jewish ecclesiastical year, called also Nisan. It begins at the spring equinox, and answers to the latter part of March and beginning of April. Its name is derived from the full growth of wheat in Egypt, which took place anciently, as it does now, at that season.

Abidance (a-bid'ans), n. The act of abiding; abode; stay. Fuller. [Rare.]

Abide (a-bid'), v. i. pret. & pp. abode; ppr. abiding. [A Sax. abidan, gebidan, to abide, from bidan, to abide. See BIDE.] 1. To take up one's abode; to dwell; to reside; to stay for a shorter or longer time.—2. To remain; not to depart.

Except these abide in the ship, ye cannot be saved. Acts xviii. 31.

3 To continue in a certain condition; to remain steadfast or faithful. 1 Cor. vii. 40. 4 To inhere; to belong, as an attribute or quality; to have its seat.

Less spirit to curse abide in me. Shak.
—Abide by, (a) to remain at rest beside. 'Abide by thy crib.' Job xxxix. 9. (b) To adhere to; to maintain; to defend; to stand to; as, to abide by a friend; specifically, in Soots law, to adhere to as true and genuine: said of the party who founds on a deed or writing which the other party desires to have reduced or declared null and void, on the ground of forgery or falsehood. (c) To await or accept the consequences of; to rest satisfied with; as, to abide by the event or issue.

Abide (a-bid'), v. t. 1. To wait for; especially, to stand one's ground against.

Abide me if thou darest. Shak.

To abide the indignation of the Lord. Joel ii. 11.

4 To put up with; to tolerate. [Colloq.]

I cannot abide the smell of hot meat. Shak.

5 [This meaning attaches to the word from a kind of confusion with aby, abie. See ABY.] To pay the price or penalty for; to suffer for.

If it be found so, some will dear abide it. Shak.

Ab me! thy little know
How dearly I abide that boast so vain. Milten.

Abider (a-bid'er), n. One who dwells or continues.

Abiding (a-bid'ing), a. Continuing; permanent; steadfast; as, an abiding faith.

Abidingly (a-bid'ing-ly), adv. In such a manner as to continue; permanently.

Abies (ab'i-es), n. [L.] The fir, a genus of trees of the sub-order Abietina, nat. order Coniferae, well known for the valuable timber that is produced by many of the species. It differs from the genus Pinus in the leaves growing singly on the stem, and the scales of the cones being smooth, round, and thin. To this genus belong the silver fir (A. picea), the great Californian fir (A. grandis), the balsam of Gilead fir (A. balsamifera), the large-bracted fir (A. nobilis), the hemlock spruce fir (A. canadensis), sacred Mexican fir (A. religiosa), Norway spruce fir (A. concolor), Oriental fir (A. orientalis), white spruce fir (A. alba), Douglas' fir (A. Douglasii), &c. See FIR, PINE.

Abietic (ab-i-et'ik), a. Of or pertaining to trees of the genus Abies.—Abietic acid (C₂₀H₃₀O₂), an acid discovered in the resin of trees of the genus Abies.

Abietinae (ab-i-et'i-n'e), n. pl. [L. Abies, the fir.] The fir and spruce, a sub-order of plants, nat. order Coniferae, having the fertile flowers in cones, with one or two inserted ovules at the base of each scale. It includes many valuable timber-trees, often rising 180 to 180 feet high, arranged under the genera Pinus, Abies, Picea, Larix, Cedrus, Araucaria, Dammara, &c.

Abietite (ab-i-et'it), n. (C₂₀H₃₀O₂). A sugar obtained from the needles of Abies pectinata.

Abietites (ab-i-et'i-t'es), n. [L. abies, the fir.] A genus of fossil plants, nat. order Coniferae, occurring in the Wealden and lower greensand strata.

Abigail (ab-i-gai), n. [From the title of Handmaid assumed to herself by Abigail, wife of Nabal, when carrying provisions to David. See 1 Sam. xx. 5.] A general name for a waiting woman or lady's-maid. [Colloq.]

I remember the time when some of our well-bred country-women kept their vaiet-de-chambre, because, forsooth, a man was much more handy about them than one of their own sex. I myself have seen one of these male Abigails tripping about the room with a looking-glass in his hand and combing his lady's hair a whole morning together. Spectator.

Abigeat (ab-i-f'e-at), n. [L. abigeatus, cattle-stealing, from abigens, a cattle-driver, from abigo, to drive away.] In law, (a) the crime of stealing or driving off cattle in droves. (b) A miscarriage procured by art.

Abiliate (a-bil'i-ate), v. t. [See ABLE.] To enable. Bacon. [Rare.]

Abiogenesis (a-bi'o-jen'e-sis), n. [Gr. a, priv., bios, life, and genesis, generation, production. See BIOGENESIS.] In biol. the doctrine that living matter may be produced by not living matter. In the seventeenth century this was the dominant view, sanctioned alike by antiquity and authority, and was first assailed by Redi, an Italian philosopher. Needham and Buffon, who have been regarded as the supporters of this hypothesis, held the doctrine in a very modified degree. They held that life is the indefeasible property of certain indestructible molecules of matter which exist in all living things, and have inherent activities by which they are distinguished from not living matter; each individual living organism being formed by their temporary combination, and they standing to it in the relation of the particles of water to a cascade or a whirlpool, or to a mould, into which the water is poured. See BIOGENESIS, HETEROGENESIS.

Abirritation (ab-i-rit'a-shon), n. [L. ab, as a dim., and irritatio, irritation.] In med. a diminished condition of the vital phenomena of the tissues, inclining to debility or asthenia.

-Able, -ible, -Ble. A very common termination of English adjectives, especially those based on verbs, representing the L. -abilis, -ibilis, a termination equivalent to the adjective habilis, fit, suitable. To the bases to which it is attached it generally adds the notion of capable of, worthy of, and sometimes full of, causing; as, obtainable, capable of being obtained; tolerable, capable of being borne; laudable, worthy of praise; credible, that may be believed, or worthy of belief; forcible, full of force; horrible, terrible, full of or causing horror, terror. Many of these adjectives, such as tolerable, credible, legible, have been borrowed directly from the Latin or the French, and are in a somewhat different position from those formed by adding the termination to an already existing English word, as in the case of obtainable. Adjectives of this kind, with a passive signification, are the most numerous, and the base may be Anglo-Saxon or Latin; eatable, bearable, readable, believable, &c., are of the former kind. Of those in -able with an active signification we may mention delectable, suitable, capable. Of a former signification are endurable, equable, conformable. All these are from verbal bases, but there are others derived from nouns, such as actionable, objectionable, peaceable, saleable, serviceable. As to when -able and when -ible is to be used, Mr. Fitzward Hall remarks, 'Generally, the termination is -ible, if the base is the essentially uncorrupted stem of a Latin infinitive or supine of any conjugation but the first. . . . To the rule given above, however, there are many objections. . . . To all verbs, then, from the Anglo-Saxon, to all based on the uncorrupted, infinitival stems of Latin verbs of the first conjugation, and to all substantives, whence-soever sprung, we annex -able only.' See his work On English Adjectives in -Able, with Special References to Reliable.

Abroacht (a-bróch'), v. t. To open, as a cask, for the purpose of taking out liquor; to tap; to broach.

Abroachment (a-bróch'ment), n. Same as Abroachment.

Abroad (a-brád'), adv. [A. Sax. onbrade, that is, on breadth, from on, and brád, broad. See BROAD.] At large; widely; without being confined to narrow limits; with expansion; as, a tree spreads its branches abroad.

The angry northern wind
Will blow these sands, like Sibyl's leaves, abroad.

Specifically, (a) beyond or out of the walls of a house, camp, or other inclosure; as, to walk abroad. (b) Beyond the bounds of a country; in foreign countries; as, to go abroad for an education; we have broils at home and enemies abroad. (c) Extensively; before the public at large.

He . . . began . . . to blaze abroad the matter.

—To be all abroad, (a) to be wide of the mark, in a figurative sense; to be far wrong in one's guess or estimate. (b) To be at a loss; to be puzzled, perplexed, bewildered, non-plussed; to be all or quite at sea.—The schoolmaster is abroad, education is diffused among the people. See under SCHOOLMASTER.

Abrocoma (ab-ro'ko-ma), n. [Gr. habros, delicate, and komé, hair.] A genus of small rodent, rat-like animals, natives of South America, remarkable for the fineness of their fur. More properly Habrocoma.

Abrogable (ab-ró-ga-bl), a. Capable of being abrogated.

Abrogate (ab-ró-gát), v. t. pret. & pp. abrogated; ppr. abrogating. [L. abrogo, to repeal—ab, from, and rogo, to ask or propose, as a law.] 1. To repeal; to annul by an authoritative act; to abolish by the authority of the maker or his successor: applied to the repeal of laws, decrees, ordinances, the abolition of established customs, &c.—2. To keep clear of; to avoid: so used by a pedant in Love's Labour's Lost.

Perge, good Holofernes, perge: so it shall please you to abrogate scurrility.

—Abolish, Repeal, Abrogate. See under ABOLISH.—SYN. To repeal, annul, set aside, rescind, revoke, abolish, cancel.

Abrogate (ab-ró-gát), a. Annulled; abolished.

Abrogation (ab-ró-gá'shon), n. The act of abrogating; repeal by authority of the legislative power, or any competent authority.

Abroma (ab-ró-ma), n. [Gr. α, neg., and bróma, food.] A genus of plants, nat. order Sterculiaceae, tribe Butnerieae. A. augusta is a native of the East Indies, and A. javanica of New South Wales. Some of the species are evergreen stove shrubs.

Abrood (a-bród'), adv. [Prefix a, on, and brood.] In the act, or as in the act of brooding.

The Spirit of God sat abrood upon the whole rude mass.

Abrooding (a-bród'ing), n. The act of brooding over.

Abrook (a-bruk'), v. t. To brook; to endure.

See BROOK.

All can thy noble mind abrook.

The abject people gazing in thy face.

Abrotanoid (a-brot'an-oid), n. [Gr. abrotan, a plant, southernwood, and oides, form.] A species of sclerodermatous corals, the Madrepora abrotanoides, an East Indian reef coral.

Abrotanum (a-brot'an-un), n. [Gr. abrotan, L. abrotanum; L. L. abrotanum.] An evergreen plant, of the genus Artemisia, called also southernwood. See SOUTHERNWOOD.

Abrupt (a-brupt'), a. [L. abruptus, from abrupto, to break off—ab, off, from, and rumpo, raptum, to break. See RUPTURE.] 1. Steep; craggy: applied to rocks, precipices, and the like.—2. Fig. sudden; without notice: to prepare the mind for the event; as, an abrupt entrance or dress.

Abrupt death,
A period puts and stops
his impious breath.

3. Unconnected; having sudden transitions from one subject to another; as, an abrupt style.—4. In bot. suddenly terminating.—Abrupt leaf, one that has its extremity cut off as it were by a transverse line.—Abrupt pinnate leaf, a leaf which has neither leaflet nor tendril at the end.

—Abrupt root, one terminating abruptly, as if part had been cut off.—SYN. Sudden, unexpected, hasty, rough, blunt, disconnected, broken.

Abrupt (ab-rupt'), n. An abrupt place; a vast chasm. [Rare and poetical.]

Or spread his airy flight,
Overborne with undefatigable wings
Over the vast abrupt.

Abrupt (ab-rupt'), v. t. To break off; to interrupt; to disturb.—Insecurity . . . abrupted our tranquillities. Sir T. Browne.

Abrupted (ab-rup'ted), a. Torn off; torn asunder.

1. Abrupt Root. 2. Abrupt Leaf. 3. Abrupt-pinnate. 4. Abrupt-leaf.

—Abrupt root, one terminating abruptly, as if part had been cut off.—SYN. Sudden, unexpected, hasty, rough, blunt, disconnected, broken.

Abrupt (ab-rup't), n. An abrupt place; a vast chasm. [Rare and poetical.]

Or spread his airy flight,
Overborne with undefatigable wings
Over the vast abrupt.

Abrupt (ab-rup't), v. t. To break off; to interrupt; to disturb.—Insecurity . . . abrupted our tranquillities. Sir T. Browne.

Abrupted (ab-rup'ted), a. Torn off; torn asunder.

ch, chain; ch, Sc. lock; g, go; j, job;

h, Fr. ton; ng, sing; th, then; th, thin;

w, wig; wh, whig; zh, azure.—See KET.

Abruption (ab-rup'ahon), n. [See ABRUPT.] A sudden breaking off; a sudden termination; a violent separation of bodies.

By this abruption posterity lost more instruction than delight. Johnson.

Abruptly (ab-rup'ti), adv. 1. Precipitantly; as, the rocks rise abruptly from the water's edge. — 2. Suddenly, without giving notice, or without the usual forms; as, the minister left France abruptly. — 3. In bot. with an abrupt termination; as, an abruptly pinnate leaf. See under ABRUPT.

Abruptness (ab-rup'tnee), n. 1. The state or quality of being abrupt; as, (a) the state or quality of being steep or craggy; precipitousness. (b) Suddenness; unceremonious haste or vehemence. — 2. Harshness or roughness in sound.

Some other languages, for their soft and melting fluency, as having no abruptness of consonants, have some advantage of the English. Hewell.

Abrus (ab'rus), n. [Gr. habros, elegant.] A genus of leguminous plants. A. precatorius, or wild liquorice, is a West Indian evergreen climber. Its polished and parti-coloured seeds, called fumble beads, were formerly strung and employed as beads for rosaries, necklaces, &c. Its root is used in the West Indies as liquorice is with us.

Abcess (ab'ses), n. [L. abcessus, a going away, and in medical language an abcess, from abcedere, to depart, to separate, to gather into an abcess—abs, away, and cedo, cessum, to go, whence cession, cede, &c.] In med. a collection of purulent matter, formed or deposited in the structure of an organ or part; an imposthume. An abcess is never an original disease, but the effect of inflammatory action however excited.

Abcession† (ab-se'shon), n. [See ABCESS.] An abcess.

Abcind (ab-sind'), v. t. [L. abscindo, to cut off—ab, from, and scindo, to cut.] To cut off. [Rare.] 'Two syllables abscinded from the rest.' Johnson.

Abcissa (ab'sis), n. Same as Abcissa.

Abcissa (ab-sis'sa), n. pl. Abcissæ (ab-sis'sæ). [L. abscissus, pp. of abscindo, to cut off. See ABCIND.] Any part of the diameter or transverse axis of a conic section, intercepted between the vertex; or some other fixed point where all the abscissæ begin, and another line called the ordinate which is terminated in the curve.

Thus, in the parabolic figure B C A, the part of the axis B C intercepted between the semi-ordinate B D and the vertex C is an abscissa. [L.] A logical series of arguments in which we go on excluding, one by one, certain suppositions from the object whose real nature we are seeking to ascertain. Thus, we may say of a disease it cannot be small-pox, for, &c.; it cannot be scarlatina, for, &c.; and so go on gradually narrowing the range of possible suppositions.

Abcission (ab-si'shon), n. [L. abscisio, from abscindo, abscisum, to cut off.] 1. The act of cutting off; severance; removal. 'Not to be cured without the abscission of a member.' Jer. Taylor. — 2. The act of putting an end to; the act of annulling or abolishing. Jer. Taylor; Sir T. Browne. — 3. Retrenchment. [Rare.] — 4. The sudden termination of a disease by death. Hooper. — 5. In rhet. a figure of speech, when, having begun to say a thing, a speaker stops abruptly, as supposing the matter sufficiently understood. Thus, 'He is a man of so much honour and candour, and such generosity—but I need say no more.'

Abseond (ab-skond'), v. i. [L. abseondo, to hide—abs, from, and condo, to hide.] 1. To retire from public view, or from the place in which one resides or is ordinarily to be found; to withdraw or absent one's self in a private manner; to take one's self off; to decamp; especially used of persons who go out of the way in order to avoid a legal process. — 2. To hide, withdraw, or lie concealed. 'The mar-mot abseonds in winter.' Ray.

Abseond† (ab-skond'), v. t. To conceal.

Nothing discoverable in the lunar surface is ever covered and abseonded from us by the interposition of any clouds or mists but such as rise from our own globe. Bentley.

Abseondedly† (ab-skond'ed-li), adv. In concealment or hiding.

An old Roman priest that then lived abseondedly in Oxon. Ifood.

Abseondence† (ab-skond'ens), n. Concealment.

Abseonder (ab-skond'er), n. One who abseonds.

Abseonsio (ab-skon'shi-o), n. [See ABSEOND.] In anat. and surg. a cavity or sinus.

Absence (ab'sens), n. [L. absentia, absence, from absens, absentis, absent, pres. part. of absum, to be absent—ab or abs, away, and sum, esse, to be. From same base are present, entity, &c.] The state of being absent: (a) the state of being at a distance in place; state of being away; opposed to presence; as, speak no ill of one in his absence. (b) The state of being wanting; non-existence within a certain sphere; as, the absence of evidence. 'In the absence of conventional law.' Ch. Kent. (c) Inattention to things present; an example or instance of inattention. 'To conquer that abstraction which is called absence.' Landor. 'Reflecting on the little absences and distractions of mankind.' Addison. — Absence of mind, the result of the mind fixing its attention on a subject which does not occupy the rest of the company, and which draws it away from things or objects present, to others distant or foreign. — Decree in absence, in Scots law, a decree pronounced against a defender who has not appeared and pleaded on the merits of the cause.

Absent (ab'sent), a. 1. Not present; not in a certain place or among certain people; at a distance; away; somewhere else. 'Absent from one another.' Gen. xxi. 49. — 2. Not existing somewhere; being wanting; not forming an attribute of something; as, among them refinement is absent; revenge is entirely absent from his character. — 3. Inattentive to persons present, or to subjects of conversation or surrounding objects; having the mind withdrawn from what is passing; heedless; as, an absent man is un-civil to the company.

What is commonly called an absent man, is commonly either a very weak or a very affected man. Chesterfield.

— Absent, Abstracted. An absent man is one whose mind is so constituted that it unconsciously wanders from the scene or circumstances in which he is; but a man is abstracted from what is present by some overmastering emotion, or some weighty matter for reflection concentrating his attention on itself.

Absent (ab-sent'), v. t. 1. To withdraw to such a distance as to prevent intercourse; to keep away; used with reflexive pronouns; as, let a man absent himself from the company. 'If I should yet absent me from your bed.' Shak. — 2. To make absent.

Go: for thy stay, not free, absents thee more. Milton.

Absent† (ab'sent), n. One who is not present. Let us enjoy the right of Christian absents, to pray for one another. Bp. Morton.

Absentaneous† (ab'sen-tā'nē-us), a. Relating to absence; absent. Bailey.

Absentation (ab-sen-tā'shon), n. The act of absenting one's self; absence.

His absentation at that juncture becomes significant. Sir W. Hamilton.

Absentee (ab-sen-tē'), n. [See ABSENCE.] One who is absent; more narrowly, one who withdraws from his country, office, estate, post, duty, or the like; one who removes to a distant place or to another country: it is a term specifically applied generally by way of reproach to landlords and capitalists, who, deriving their income from one country, reside in another, in which they spend their incomes. — Absentee tax, a tax of 4s. in the pound, imposed in Ireland in 1715 on the incomes and pensions of absentees. It ceased in 1773. Unsuccessful attempts were made in 1773 and 1788 to reimpose it.

Absenteeism (ab-sen-tē'izm), n. The practice or habit which gives the name of an absentee; the practice of absenting one's self from one's country, station, or estate.

Absenter (ab-sen-tēr), n. One who absents himself.

He (Judge Foster) has fined all the absenters £40 apiece. Ld. Thurlow.

Absently (ab'sent-li), adv. In an absent or inattentive manner; with absence of mind.

Absentment (ab-sent'ment), n. The state of being absent. Barrow. [Rare.]

Absinth (ab'sinth), n. Wormwood. See ABSINTHIUM.

Absinthe (ab-sant, ap-sant), n. [Fr.] A popular French liqueur or cordial consisting of brandy flavoured with wormwood.

Absinthian (ab-sin'thi-an), a. [See ABSIN-

THIUM.] Of the nature of wormwood. 'Tempering absinthian bitterness with sweets.' Randolph.

Absinthiate (ab-sin'thi-āt), v. t. To impregnate with wormwood.

Absinthin, Absinthine (ab-sin'thin), n. (C₁₅H₁₂O₆). The crystalline bitter principle of wormwood (Artemisia Absinthium).

Absinthium (ab-sin'thi-um), n. [L. absinthium, Gr. absinthion, Per. and Chal. afsinthin.] The common wormwood (Artemisia Absinthium), a bitter plant, used as a tonic. It belongs to the nat. order Compositæ.

Abais (ab'sis), n. In astron. see APSIS.

Abait† (ab-ist'), v. t. [L. abisto, to withdraw.] To stand off; to leave off.

Abastance† (ab-sis'tens), n. A standing off; a refraining or holding back from.

Abait omen (ab'sit'ō'men), [L.] May it not be ominous! May the omen be falsified!

Absolute (ab'sō-lūt), a. [L. absolutus. See ABSOLVE.] 1. Freed from limitation or condition; unconditional; as, an absolute promise; an absolute bond. — 2. Unlimited by extraneous power or control; as, an absolute government or prince. — 3. Complete in itself; finished; perfect; consummate; as, absolute beauty; now applied in this sense only to qualities, but formerly applied also to persons. 'As grave, as just, as absolute as Angelo.' Shak.

So absolute she seems Milton.

And in herself complete.

4. Positive; decided; certain; not in doubt; frequent in Shakspeare, but now rare.

The colour of my hair he cannot tell, Or answers dark, at random; while he sure, He's absolute on the figure, five or ten, Of my last subscription. Mrs. Browning.

5. Peremptory; authoritative. 'Tapped her on the head with absolute forefinger.' Mrs. Browning. — 6.† Absolved; freed. Chaucer.

7. In metaph. (a) not relative; as, absolute knowledge, that is, immediate knowledge of things as they exist in themselves, as distinguished from relative knowledge, which is a knowledge of things as they appear to the perceptive mind. (b) Existing independent of any other cause; self-existing; self-sufficing; existing without condition or relation; unconditional; as, God is absolute. (c) In the philosophy of Sir W. Hamilton, unconditionally limited; having limits which belong unconditionally to the object; opposed to infinite. — 8. In gram. applied to the case used to express certain circumstances adverbially when the case is not determined by any other word in the sentence; as, the genitive absolute in Greek, and the ablative absolute in Latin. — 9. In chem. pure; unmixed; as, absolute alcohol.

— Absolute equation, in astron. the sum of the optic and eccentric equations. The apparent inequality of a planet's motion in its orbit, arising from its unequal distances from the earth at different times, is called its optic equation; this would subsist if the planet's real motion was uniform. The eccentric inequality is caused by the planet's motion not being uniform. — Absolute term or number, in alg. that term which is completely known, and to which all the other part of an equation is made equal; thus, in the equation $x^2 + 12x = 24$, the absolute term is 24. — Absolute motion, the absolute change of place in a moving body, independent of the motion of any other body. — Absolute magnitude of a force, the intensity of a force measured by weight, as by pounds, &c. — Absolute gravity, that by which a body descends freely and perpendicularly in a vacuum or non-resisting medium; or it may be considered as the whole force with which a body is impelled toward the centre of attraction, without regard to modifying circumstances. — 878. Positive, peremptory, certain, unconditional, arbitrary, despotic, unconditional, unrelated.

Absolute (ab'sō-lūt), n. In metaph. (a) that which exists independent of condition or relation; the self-existent unalterable original; the ultimate cause of all phenomena: always preceded by the definite article the absolute.

All philosophy aims at a knowledge of the absolute under different phases. Fleming.

(b) In the philosophy of Sir W. Hamilton, that which is unconditionally limited; that to which limits belong in the very nature of things.

The unconditionally unlimited, or the infinite, the unconditionally limited, or the absolute, cannot positively be construed by the mind. Sir W. Hamilton.

Absolutely (ab-sô-lût-lî), adv. Completely; wholly; without restriction, limitation, or qualification; unconditionally; positively; perpetually.

Absolutely we cannot commend, we cannot absolutely approve, either willingness to live or fearlessness to die. Hooker.

Command me absolutely not to go. Milton.

Absoluteness (ab-sô-lût-nês), n. The state of being absolute; independence; completeness; the state of being subject to no extraneous restriction or control; positiveness.

Absolution (ab-sô-lû'shon), n. [L. absolutio. See ABOLVE.] 1. The act of absolving or state of being absolved; release from consequences, obligations, or penalties; specifically, in the Roman Catholic and some other churches, a remission of sins pronounced by a priest in favour of a penitent. Protestants ascribe a declarative, but not an efficient power to absolution. It announces and assures forgiveness, on the ground of repentance, but does not impart it. — 2. In the following passage the meaning is doubtful, perhaps finish; pollah.

Some men are tall and big; so some language is high and great. Then the words are chosen, their sound ample, the composition full, the absolutions plentiful, and poured out, all grave, sincere, and strong. B. Jensen, Discoveries.

Absolutism (ab-sô-lût-izm), n. 1. State of being absolute, or principles of absolute government.

If the emperor cannot acquiesce in this, the other road is to complete absolutism. Times newspaper.

2. Doctrine of predestination or absolute decrees.

Absolutist (ab-sô-lût-ist), n. 1. An advocate for despotism, or for absolute government. 2. In metaph. one who maintains that it is possible to realize a cognition or concept of the absolute.

Hence the necessity which compelled Schelling and the absolutists to place the absolute in the indifference of subject and object, of knowledge and existence. Sir W. Hamilton.

Absolutistic (ab-sô-lût-ist'ik), a. Pertaining to absolutism.

Absolutory (ab-sô-lû'to-ri), a. Absolving or capable of absolving. 'An absolutory sentence.' Apule.

Absolvable (ab-sô-lv'a-bl), a. That may be absolved.

Absolvent (ab-sô-lv'a-to-ri), a. Conferring absolution, pardon, or release; having power to absolve.

Absolve (ab-sôlv'), v.t. pret. & pp. absolved; ppr. absolving. [L. absolvo, to set free—ab, from, and solvo, to loose, to solve.] 1. To set free or release from some duty, obligation, or responsibility; as, to absolve a person from a promise. — 2. To free from the consequences or penalties attaching to actions; to acquit; specifically, in eccles. lan. to forgive or grant remission of sins to; to pronounce forgiveness of sins to. — 3. To accomplish; to finish. 'The work begun, how soon absolved.' Milton. — 4. To solve; to resolve; to explain. 'Absolve we this?' Young.

RYN. To free, release, exonerate, discharge, acquit, pardon.

Absolver (ab-sôlv'ér), n. One who absolves; one that pronounces sin to be remitted.

Absolvitor (ab-sôlv'í-tor), n. In law, a decree of absolution. — Decree of absolvitor, in Scots law, a decree in favour of the defender in an action. A decree in favour of the pursuer is called a decree condemnator.

ABSONANT (ab-sô-nant), a. [L. ab, from, and sonans, ppr. of sonare, to sound. See ABSONOUS.] Wide from the purpose; contrary; discordant; opposed to consonant. 'Absonant to nature.' Quarles.

Absonate (ab-sô-nat), v.t. To avoid; to detect. Abb.

Absonous (ab-sô-nus), a. [L. absonus—ab, from, and sonus, sound.] 1. Unmusical. 2. Fig. discordant; opposed; contrary. 'Absonous to our reason.' Glanville.

Absorb (ab-sorb'), v.t. [L. absorbeo—ab, from, and sorbeo, to suck in.] 1. To drink in; to suck up; to imbibe, as a sponge; to take in by absorption, as the lacteals of the body. 2. To swallow up; to engulf, as a body in a whirlpool.

And dark oblivion soon absorbs them all. Cowper.

3. To waste wholly or sink in expenses; to exhaust; as, to absorb an estate in luxury. — 4. To engross or engage wholly; as, these studies quite absorbed his attention. — 5. To take up or receive in, as by chemical or molecular action, as when carbon absorbs gases.

6. In med. to counteract or neutralize; as, magnesia absorbs acidity in the stomach.

—Absorb, Engross. Absorb rather refers to the occupation of one's mind or attention in anything so that the person is withdrawn from his external surroundings for the time being, a certain amount of passivity being attached to the use of the word; engross is rather to engage one's whole attention and energies, thus implying activity; thus one is absorbed in a novel, but engrossed in business; the words, however, are sometimes interchangeable.

Absorbability (ab-sorb'a-bil'i-tî), n. The state or quality of being absorbable.

Absorbable (ab-sorb'a-bl), a. Capable of being absorbed or imbibed.

Absorbed (ab-sorb'd), p. and a. Specifically, applied to pictures in which the oil has sunk into the canvas, leaving the colour flat and the touches dead or indistinct: nearly synonymous with chilled.

Absorbent (ab-sorb'ent), a. Capable of absorbing fluids; imbibing; swallowing; performing the function of absorption; as, absorbent vessels; absorbent system. See the noun. — Absorbent grounds, in painting, picture grounds prepared either in board or canvas, so as to have the power of imbibing the redundant oil from the colours, for the sake of expedition, or to increase the brilliancy of the colours.

Absorbent (ab-sorb'ent), n. Anything which absorbs; specifically, (a) in anat. and physiol. a vessel which imbibes or takes in nutritive matters into the system; specifically, in the vertebrate class of animals, one of a system of vessels ramifying through the body and forming a connecting link between the digestive and the circulatory systems, that is, acting as the media through which matters are absorbed from the alimentary canal on the one hand, and from the blood and tissues on the other. They are denominated, according to the liquids which they convey, lacteals or lymphatics, which both end in a common trunk called the thoracic duct. (b) In med. a medicine which neutralizes acidity in the stomach and bowels, as magnesia, prepared chalk, &c. (c) In surg. a substance, as cobweb, sponge, &c., applied to a bleeding surface to arrest hemorrhage, by forming with the blood a solid adhesive compound. (d) In chem. anything that takes up into itself a gas or liquid, as a substance which withdraws moisture from the air; also a substance, such as magnesia, lime, &c., which neutralizes acids.

Absorbing (ab-sorb'ing), p. and a. Imbibing; engrossing; as, the spectacle was most absorbing. — Absorbing well, a shaft sunk through an impermeable bed or stratum into a permeable one so as to carry off water conveyed into it. Such wells are employed in mining and manufactures to carry off excess of drainage water or water defiled by noxious substances. Called also Dead Well.

Absorption (ab-sôrb'ishon), n. Absorption.

Absorpt (ab-sorpt'). Same as Absorbed.

Absorptiometer (ab-sôrb'shi-om'et-ér), n. [L. absorptio, absorption, and Gr. metron, a measure.] An instrument invented by Professor Bunsen to determine the amount of gas absorbed by a unit volume of liquid. It is a graduated tube in which a certain quantity of the gas and liquid is agitated over mercury. The amount of absorption is measured on the scale by the height the mercury presses up the liquid in the tube.

Absorption (ab-sôrb'ishon), n. [L. absorptio. See ABSORB.] The act or process of absorbing, or state of being absorbed in all the senses of the verb; as, (a) the act or process of imbibing, swallowing, engulfing mechanically. (b) The condition of having one's attention entirely occupied with something. (c) In chem. and physics, a taking in or reception by molecular or chemical action, as absorption of gases, light, heat; as, the absorption of heat by surrounding bodies; absorption of electricity. (d) In physiol. one of the vital organic functions by which the materials of growth and nutrition are absorbed and conveyed to the organs of plants and animals. In vertebrate animals this is performed by the absorbent system, consisting of the lymphatics and lacteals and their connected glands. Plants absorb moisture and nutritive juices principally by their roots, but sometimes by their general surfaces, as in sea-weeds, and carbonic acid by their leaves. — Interstitial absorption.

See under INTERSTITIAL. — Cutaneous or external absorption, in med. the process by which certain substances, when placed in contact with a living surface, produce the same effects upon the system as when taken into the stomach or injected into the veins, only in a less degree. Thus, arsenic, when applied to an external wound, will sometimes affect the system as rapidly as when introduced into the stomach; and mercury, applied externally, has the effect of exciting salivation. — Absorption of colour, the phenomenon observed when certain colours are retained or prevented from passing through certain transparent bodies; thus pieces of coloured glass are almost opaque to some parts of the spectrum, while allowing other colours to pass through freely. The absorption of light is the same kind of phenomenon. — Absorption of light, that quality in an imperfectly transparent or opaque body by which some portion of an incident pencil of light is retained within the body, while the rest is either transmitted through it or reflected from it. It is owing to this that a certain thickness of pure water shows a greenish colour, glass a bluish-green colour. — Absorption lines, in spectrum analysis, dark lines produced in a spectrum by the absorbing of a portion of the light by a vapour intervening between the source of light and the spectroscope. — Absorption spectrum, a spectrum with absorption lines. — Absorption of heat, that quality in an imperfectly polished or opaque body by which the rays of heat impinging on its surface enter its body to be distributed afterwards by radiation: absorption is in inverse ratio to reflection.

Absorptive (ab-sôrb'tiv), a. [Fr. absorptif.] Having power to absorb or imbibe.

Absorptivity (ab-sôrb-tiv'i-tî), n. The power or capacity of absorption. 'The absorptivity inherent in organic beings.' Dana. [Rare.]

Absquatulate (ab-skwo'tû-lât), v.t. To run away; to abscond; to make off. [An American vulgarism.]

Absque hoc (ab-skwe' hok). [L.] Without this or that; specifically, in law, words used in traversing what has been alleged, and is repeated.

Abstain (ab-stân'), v.i. [Norm. absteigner, Fr. abstenir, to hold one's self back, to abstain; L. abstinere, to keep from—ab, from, and teneo, to hold. Contain, tenant, tenacious, &c., are from the same stem.] To forbear or refrain from voluntarily, especially to refrain from what gratifies the passions or appetites; to refrain; to forbear; to withhold; as, to abstain from the use of ardent spirits; to abstain from luxuries.

Abstain from meats offered to idols. Acts xv. 29.

Abstainer (ab-stân'ér), n. One who abstains; specifically, one who abstains from the use of intoxicating liquors; a teetotaler.

Abstemious (ab-stê'mi-us), a. [L. abstemius—ab, and root seen in temetum, strong drink. temulentus, drunken; Skr. tim, to be wet.] 1. Sparing in diet; refraining from a free use of food and strong drinks; temperate; abstinent.

Under his special eye

Abstemious I grew up and thrived amain. Milton.

Instances of longevity are chiefly among the abstemious. Arbuthnot.

2. Characterized by great temperance; very moderate and plain; very sparing; spare; as, an abstemious diet; opposed to luxurious or rich. — 3. Devoted to or spent in abstemiousness or abstinence; as, an abstemious life.

Till yonder sun descend, O let me pay

To grief and anguish one abstemious day. Pope.

4. Promoting or favouring abstemiousness; associated with abstemiousness. [Rare.]

Such is the virtue of th' abstemious well. Dryden.

Abstemiously (ab-stê'mi-us-lî), adv. In an abstemious manner; temperately; with a sparing use of meat or drink.

Abstemiousness (ab-stê'mi-us-nês), n. The quality or habit of being temperate or sparing in the use of food and strong drinks. [This word expresses a greater degree of abstinence than temperance.]

Abstention (ab-sten'shon), n. [L. abstentio. See ABSTAIN.] The act of holding off or abstaining; abstinence.

As may well be supposed, this abstention of our light cavalry was observed by the Russians with surprise and thankfulness, by the head-quarters staff of the English with surprise and vexation, by the French with surprise and curiosity. Kingsley.

Absterge (ab-stérj'), v.t. pret. & pp. absterged; ppr. absterging. [L. abstergeo, to wipe off—

abe, and tergeo, to wipe.] 1. To wipe, or make clean by wiping; to wash away. 'To absterpe, belike, that fulsomeness of sweat to which they are then subject.' Sir T. Browne.—2. In med. to cleanse by lotions, as a wound or ulcer; also, to purge. See DEREGENT.

Abstergent (ab-stér-jent), n. A Having cleansing or purgative properties.

Abstergent (ab-stér-jent), n. 1. Whatever aids in scouring or cleansing, as soap or fuller's earth.—2. In med. a lotion or other application for cleansing a sore: in this sense nearly superseded by detergent.

Absterse (ab-stér-sé), v.t. To absterge; to cleanse; to purify. Sir T. Browne. [Rare.]

Absterision (ab-stér-shon), n. [L. absterisio. See ABSTERGENT.] 1. The act of wiping clean. 'Absterision and absterisio.' Sir W. Scott. 2. In med. a cleansing by medicines which remove foulness about sores, or humours or obstructions from the system.

Absterision is plainly a scouring off or incision of the more viscous humours, and making the humours more fluid; and cutting between them and the part.

Absterive (ab-stér-iv), a. Cleansing; having the quality of removing foulness. See DETERGENT.

The seats with purple clothe in order due, And let the absterive sponge the board renew. Pope.

Absterive (ab-stér-iv), n. That which effects absterision; that which purifies.

Absterives are fuller's earth, soap, linseed-oil, and ox-gall. Sp. Spruce.

Absteriveness (ab-stér-iv-nes), n. Quality of being absterive or abstergent. 'A caustic or a healing faculty, absteriveness, and the like.' Boyle.

Abstinence (ab-sti-nens), n. [L. abstinentia. See ABSTAIN.] 1. In general, the act or practice of voluntarily refraining from the use of anything within our reach; forbearing any action; abnegation.

Since materials are destroyed as such by being once used, the whole of the labour required for their protection, as well as the abstinence of the persons who supplied the means for carrying it on, must be remunerated. J. S. Mill.

More specifically—2. The refraining from indulgence in the pleasures of the table, or from customary gratifications of any animal or sensual propensities. It denotes either a total forbearance, or a forbearance of the usual quantity.

Against diseases here the strongest fence Is the defensive virtue abstinence. Herrick.

Men flew to frivolous amusements and to criminal pleasures with greediness which long and enforced abstinence naturally produces. Macaulay.

3. In a still narrower sense: (a) forbearance from the use of ardent spirits: in this sense abstinence is usually preceded by the adjective total. (b) Eccles. the refraining from certain kinds of food on certain days, as flesh on Fridays.

Abstinency (ab-sti-nen-si), n. Same as Abstinence. [Rare.]

Abstinent (ab-sti-nent), a. [L. abstinens, abstinens. See ABSTAIN.] Refraining from indulgence, especially in the use of food and drink.

Abstinent (ab-sti-nent), n. 1. One of a sect which appeared in France and Spain in the third century, who opposed marriage, condemned the use of flesh meat, and placed the Holy Spirit in the class of created beings.—2. A name sometimes given to a teetotaler.

Abstinently (ab-sti-nent-li), adv. In an abstinent manner; with abstinence.

Abstorted† (ab-stort-ed), a. [L. abs, and tortus, pp. of torqueo, tortum, to wrench. See TORTURE.] Forced away. Bailey.

Abstract (ab-strakt), v.t. [From L. abstraho, abstractum, to draw away—abs, and traho, tractum, to draw, which appears also in contract, delect, retract, &c., and is allied to E. drag.] 1. To draw away; to take away; to withdraw; as, to abstract the attention of any one.—2. To take away mentally; to separate, as the qualities or properties of an object in the mind; to consider separately; as, to abstract ideas.—3. To derive the idea of; to receive suggestions of; to deduce.

And thus from divers accidents and acts Which do within her observation fall, The goddesses and powers divine abstract, As Nature, Fortune, and the Virtues all. Sir J. Davies.

4. To select or separate the substance of a book or writing; to epitomize or reduce to a summary.

Let us abstract them into brief compends. Watts.

5. To take secretly for one's own use from the property of another when placed in one's power; to purloin; as, to abstract goods from a parcel or money from a bank.—6. To separate, as the spirits or more volatile part from any substance by distillation: but in this sense abstract is now more generally used. 'Having abstracted the whole spirit.' Boyle.

Abstract (ab-strakt), v.i. To form abstractions; to separate ideas; to distinguish between the attribute and the concrete in which it exists. 'Brutes abstract not.' Locke. —To abstract, from, to separate our thoughts from; to leave out of consideration.

Could we abstract from these pernicious effects, and suppose this were innocent, it would be too light to be matter of praise. Dr. H. More.

Abstract (ab-strakt), a. [L. abstractus, pp. of abstraho, abstractum. See ABSTRACT, v.t.] 1. Considered in itself; treated by itself; considered and treated apart from any application to a particular object; as, abstract mathematics; abstract logic.—2. Not concrete; very general; hence, abstruse, difficult; as, a very abstract subject of disquisition. In metaph. an abstract idea is an idea separated from a complex object, or from other ideas which naturally accompany it, as the solidity of marble contemplated apart from its colour or figure. In gram. and logic, abstract nouns or terms are names of qualities, in opposition to concrete, which are names of things. Some metaphysicians understand by abstract terms all names which are the result of abstraction or generalization. This latter usage is strongly condemned by J. S. Mill (Log. i. 2, § 4), who applies to such words the term general names.—Abstract or pure mathematics is that which treats of the properties of magnitude, figure, or quantity, absolutely and generally considered, without restriction to any particular object, such as arithmetic and geometry. Abstract mathematics is thus distinguished from mixed mathematics, in which simple and abstract quantities previously considered in the former are applied to particular sensible objects, as astronomy, mechanics, optics, &c.—Abstract numbers are assemblages of units considered independently of any thing or things that they might otherwise be supposed to represent. For example, 5 is an abstract number while it remains independent; but if we say 5 feet or 5 miles it is no longer an abstract but a concrete number.—3. Having the senses unemployed; insensible to outward objects; abstracted. 'Abstract as in a trance.' Milton.

4. Lacking a concrete object; refined; pure. [Rare.]

Love's not so pure and abstract, as they use To say, which have no mistress but their muse. Donne.

Abstract (ab-strakt), n. 1. That which concentrates in itself the essential qualities of anything more extensive or more general, or of several things; the essence: now almost, if not quite exclusively applied to a summary or epitome containing the substance, a general view, or the principal heads of a treatise or writing.

You shall there find a man who is the abstract of all faults all men follow. Shak.

When Mnemon came to the end of a chapter he recollected the sentiments that he had remarked; so that he could give a tolerable analysis and abstract of every treatise he had read just after he had finished it. Watts.

Specifically—2. In arch. and engin. that portion of the bill of quantities, estimate, or account, which contains the summary of the various detailed articles: it is upon this abstract that the prices are applied.—3. A catalogue; an inventory. [Rare.]

He hath an abstract for the remembrance of such places, and goes to them by his note. Shak.

4. In gram. an abstract term or noun.

The concrete 'like' has its abstract likeness; the concretes 'father' and 'son' have, or might have, the abstract 'paternity' and 'filiiety' or 'filiation.' J. S. Mill.

—In the abstract, in a state of separation; as, a subject considered in the abstract, i.e. without reference to particular applications.

—Abstract of title, in law, an epitome or short statement of the evidences of ownership.—Abstract, See under ABRIDGMENT.

Abstracted (ab-strakt-ed), pp. and a. 1. Separated.

The evil one abstracted stood from his own evil. Milton.

2. Refined; exalted. 'Abstracted spiritual love.' Donne.—3. Difficult; abstruse; abstract. Johnson.—4. Absent in mind; inattentive.

And now no more the abstracted ear attends The water's murmuring lapse. T. Warren.

—Absent, Abstracted. See under ABSENT.

Abstractedly (ab-strakt-ed-li), adv. 1. In a separate state, or in contemplation only.

Deeming the exception to be rather a case abstractedly possible, than one which is frequently realized in fact. J. S. Mill.

2. In an abstracted or absent manner.

Abstractedness (ab-strakt-ed-nes), n. The state of being abstracted; abstruseness. 'The abstractedness of these speculations.' Hume.

Abstracter (ab-strakt-ér), n. One who abstracts; as, (a) one who makes an abstract or summary. (b) One who purloins.

Abstraction (ab-strak-shon), n. [L. abstractio. See ABSTRACT, v.t.] 1. The act of abstracting or separating; the act of withdrawing; withdrawal; as, the abstraction of heat from the body. Specifically—2. The act of separating mentally the qualities or properties of an object; the act of considering separately what is united in a complex object. Thus, when the mind considers the branch of a tree by itself, or the colour of the leaves, as separate from their size or figure, the act is called abstraction. So also when it considers whiteness, softness, virtue, existence, as separate from any particular objects. Abstraction is the ground-work of classification, by which things are arranged in orders, genera, and species. We separate in ideas the qualities of certain objects which are of the same kind, from others which are different in each, and arrange the objects having the same properties in a class or collected body.

If, in contemplating several objects, and finding that they agree in certain points, we abstract the circumstances of agreement, disregarding the differences, and give to all and each of these objects a name applicable to them in respect of this agreement, i.e. a common name, as 'rose,' or again, if we give a name to some attribute wherein they agree, as 'greenness' or 'redness,' we are then said to generalize. Abstraction, therefore, does not necessarily imply generalization, though generalization implies abstraction. Whately.

3. The act of ascending from what is concrete and particular to what is abstract and general; the act of refining or sublimating.

This was an age of vision and mystery; and every work was believed to contain a double or secondary meaning. Nothing escaped this eccentric spirit of re-ascendancy and abstraction. T. Warren.

4. Something abstract; an idea or notion of an abstract character; an idea or notion having no discoverable relation to fact or practice; a theoretical, impracticable notion.

What are metaphysics themselves but intricate subtleties and fruitless abstractions? Butler.

5. A separation from worldly objects; a reclusive life; as, a hermit's abstraction.

6. Absence of mind; inattention to present objects; the state of being engrossed with any matter to the exclusion of everything else; as, a fit of abstraction.—7. The taking for one's own use part of the property of another.—8. In distillation, the separation of volatile parts from those which are fixed. It is chiefly used when a fluid is repeatedly poured upon any substance in a retort, and distilled off, to change its state, or the nature of its composition.

Abstractitious† (ab-strakt-tiv-ahus), a. Abstracted or drawn from other substances, particularly from vegetables, without fermentation. Ash.

Abstractive (ab-strakt-iv), a. 1. Having the power or quality of abstracting. 'The abstractive faculty.' Is. Taylor.—2.† Abstractitious.

Abstractively (ab-strakt-iv-li), adv. In an abstractive manner; in or by itself; abstractly. [Rare or obsolete.]

The life which abstractively is good, by accidents and adherences may become unfortunate. Faithham.

Abstractly (ab-strakt-iv), adv. In an abstract manner or state; absolutely, in a state or manner unconnected with anything else; in or by itself; as, matter abstractly considered.

Abstruseness (ab-strak-nes), n. The state or quality of being abstract; a state of being in contemplation only, or not connected with any object. 'The abstruseness of the ideas themselves.' Locke.

Abstraction (ab-strak-shon), n. [L. ab, from, and stringo, strictum, to bind.] The act of unbinding. [Rare.]

Abstringe† (ab-strin-jé), v.t. [L. abstringo—ab, and stringo, to bind.] To unbind.

Abstrude (ab-strud'), v.t. [L. abstrudo—ab or abs, and trudo, trusum, to thrust.] To thrust away. Johnson.

Abstruse (ab-strus'), a. [L. abstrusus, pp. of abstrudo, to thrust away.] 1. Withdrawn from view; out of the way; concealed. 'Hidden in the most abstruse dungeons of Barbary.' Shelton.—2. Remote from apprehension; difficult to be comprehended or understood; profound; opposed to what is obvious.

It must be still confessed that there are some mysteries in religion, both natural and revealed, as well as some abstruse points in philosophy, wherein the wise as well as the unwise must be content with obscure ideas. Watts.

Abstrusely (ab-strú'sh), adv. In an abstruse manner; in a manner not to be easily understood.

Abstruseness (ab-strú'sh-nes), n. The state or quality of being abstruse, or difficult to be understood.

Abstrusion (ab-strú'sh-on), n. The act of thrusting away. [Rare.]

Abstrusify (ab-strú'sh-i), v. Abstruseness; that which is abstruse. 'Matters of difficulty and such which were not without abstrusities.' Sir T. Browne.

Abstruse (ab-strú'sh), v. [L. abstruso—ab, and struso, to take.] To bring to an end by a gradual waste; to consume; to destroy; to cause to disappear. Boyle.

Abstrusion (ab-strú'sh-on), n. [L. abstrusio. See ABSTRUSE.] Destruction. 'The total defect or abstrusion of religion.' Bp. Gauden.

Aburd (ab-é-árd'), a. [L. absurdus—ab, and cerdus, deaf, insensible. See SURD.] 1. Acting in a manner contrary to common sense or sound judgment; inconsistent with common sense; ridiculous; nonsensical; as, an aburd fellow; an aburd statement; aburd conduct.

A man who cannot write with wit on a proper subject is dull and stupid; but one who shews it in an improper place is as impertinent and aburd. Addison.

Specifically.—2. In logic or philos. inconsistent with reason; logically contradictory; impossible; as, that the whole is less than the sum of its parts is an aburd hypothesis; an aburd proposition.—Aburd, foolish, irrational, irrefuted, preposterous. Aburd, opposed to common sense, and hence often exciting ridicule or amusement; foolish, characterized by weakness of mind or silliness; foolish conduct is such as gives rise to a certain feeling of contempt; irrational, plainly and evidently opposed to reason; irrefuted, driven on by fate, not under the control of reason, possessed or caused by some misleading but overmastering idea; preposterous is not used of persons, and when used of actions, modes of procedure, &c., expresses a very high degree of absurdity, as much as amounts to putting the cart before the horse.

The phrase aburd to call a villain great. Pope.
I am a very foolish, fond old man. Shak.
It seemed utterly irrational any longer to maintain it. Dr. Taylor.

The people are so infatuated that if a cow falls sick, it is run to one but an old woman is clapt up in prison for it. Addison.

Though the error be easily fallen into, it is manifestly preposterous. Dr. Taylor.

SYN. Foolish, irrational, ridiculous, preposterous, nonsensical, inconsistent, incongruous.

Aburd (ab-é-árd'), n. An act of absurdity. [Rare.]

This arch aburd that wit and fool delights. Pope.

Aburdity (ab-é-árd'i-ti), n. [L. absurditas; Fr. absurdité.] 1. The quality of being aburd or inconsistent with obvious truth, reason, or sound judgment; want of rationality or common sense; as, the aburdity of such an idea; the aburdity of his conduct. 2. That which is aburd; an aburd action: in this sense it has a plural; as, the aburdities of men.—SYN. Folly, foolishness, inconsistency, preposterousness, self-contradiction, unreasonableness.

Aburdly (ab-é-árd'i), adv. In an aburd manner; in a manner inconsistent with reason or obvious propriety.

4. Violation of a female.

After the abuse he forsook me. Sir P. Sidney.

5. Deception.
Is it some abuse, and no such thing? Shak.

Abuse of distress, in law, using an animal or chattel distrained, which makes the distrainer liable, as for wrongful appropriation.—Abuse, inveective. 'Abuse as compared with invective is more personal and coarse, being conveyed in harsh and unseemly terms, and dictated by angry feeling and bitter temper. Inveective is more commonly aimed at character or conduct, and may be conveyed in writing and in refined language, and dictated by indignation against what is in itself blameworthy. It often, however, means public abuse under such restraints as are imposed by position and education.' C. J. Smith.

Abuseful (a-bú's-fúl), a. Using or practising abuse; abusive. 'The abuseful names of heretics and schismatics.' Bp. Barlow. [Rare or obsolete.]

Abusefulness (ab-bú's-fúl-nes), n. Want or absence of usefulness. [Probably coined by Mr. Buskin.]

And it depends on the person more than on the article whether its usefulness or abusefulness will be the quality developed in it. Buskin.

Abuser (a-bú's-ér), n. One who abuses, in speech or behaviour; one that deceives; a ravisher. 'Next thou, th' abuser of thy prince's ear.' Sir J. Denham. 'That vile abuser of young maidens.' J. Fletcher.

As objects of ornament the acacias are usually of striking beauty. Some of the species produce casahuate, as A. Cateshu, and some crude gum-arabic, as A. Verru, A. arabica, A. vera.

beamed that the Son, though similar to, was not the same as the Father, others, that he was both distinct and dissimilar.

Acacia-tree (a-kā'shi-a-trē), n. A name sometimes applied to the false acacia or locust-tree (Robinia pseudacacia).

Acacio (a-kā'shi-ō), n. [See ACAJOU] A heavy durable wood of the red mahogany character, but darker and paler. Called also Acajou.

Acacy! (ak'-a-si), n. [Gr. akasia—s, priv., and kates, bad.] Freedom from malice. Ash.

Our court shall be a little academe. Shak.

Not hath fair Europe her vast bounds throughout
An academe of poets I found not out. Hemans.

Academical (ak-a-dē-mi-kal), a. Pertaining to an academy. Johnson. [Bara.]

Academian! (ak-a-dē-mi-an), n. A member of an academy, a student in a university or college. 'That new-discarded academian.' Milton.

Academic, Academical (ak-a-dē-mi-k, ak-a-dē-mi-kal), a. [L. academicus; Fr. académique] 1 Belonging to the school or philosophy of Plato in this sense the form academic is exclusively, or almost exclusively, used.—2 Belonging to an academy, or to a college or university, as, academic studies.—Figures of academic proportions in painting, a figure of little less than half the size of nature, such as it is the custom for pupils to draw from the antique and from life; also, any figure in an attitude conventional, or resembling those chosen in life academies, for the purpose of displaying to the students muscular action, form, and colour to the best advantage.

Academic (ak-a-dē-mi-k), n. 1 One who belonged to the school or adhered to the philosophy of Plato. 2 A student in a college or university. 'A young academic.' Watts.

Academical (ak-a-dē-mi-kal), n. 1 A member of any academical club.—2 pl. The costume proper to the officers and students of a school or college.

Academically (ak'-a-dē-mi-kal-ly), adv. In an academical manner.

Academical (ak'-a-dē-mi'-khal), n. A member of an academy or society for promoting arts and sciences, particularly, (a) a member of the Royal Academy of Arts, (b) a member of the French Academy. See ACADEMY.

Academism (a-kad'-em-izm), n. The doctrines of the Academic philosophy.

Academist (a-kad'-em-ist), n. 1 An Academic philosopher.—2 A member of an academy. Ray.

Academy (a-kad'-em-ē), n. [L. academeia, Gr. academeia, the Academy, from the hero Academus, to whom the ground originally belonged which formed the garden in which Plato taught] 1 Originally a garden, grove, or villa, near Athens, where Plato and his followers held their philosophical conferences, hence, Plato and his followers collectively, the members of the school of Plato.

Had the poor vulgar root only been abused into such idolatrous superstitions, as to adore a marble or a golden deity it might not so much be wondered at, but for the Academy to own such a paradox,—this was without excuse. South.

2 A school or seminary of learning, holding a rank between a university or college and an elementary school, also, a school for teaching a particular art or particular sciences, as, a military academy.—3 An association for the promotion of literature, science, or art, established sometimes by government, and sometimes by the voluntary union of private individuals. The members (Academicians), who are usually divided into ordinary, honorary, and corresponding members, either select their own department or follow those prescribed by the constitution of the society, and at regular meetings communicate the results of their labours in papers, of which the more important are afterwards printed. The French Academy, the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles-lettres, the Academy of Sciences, the Academy of the Fine Arts, and the Academy of Moral and Political Sciences compose the French National Institute. The Royal Academy of Arts, in London, was founded in 1768 'for the purpose of cultivating and improving the arts of painting, sculpture, and architecture.' The number of academicians, originally thirty-six, is now forty-two, among whom are two engravers. The Royal Scottish Academy of Painting, Sculpture, and Architecture was founded in 1820 on the model of the London Academy. It was incorporated in 1838, and consists of thirty academicians. Academy Agave, in painting, an academic study, a drawing or painting of the human figure nude, or partially draped, such as is made by students of painting.

Acadian (a-kā'di-an), a. Belonging to Acadia or Nova Scotia.

Acadian (a-kā'di-an), n. A native or inhabitant of Acadia or Nova Scotia.

Acajou (ak'-a-jō), n. [Fr. acajou, Sp. caoba, Pg. acou, caia, It. acorgia, caia, mahogany, probably from Malay ayo, a tree.] 1 A kind of heavy red mahogany, acacia.—2 A gum and resin from the stem of the mahogany-tree.

Acaleph, Acalephan (ak'-a-lē, ak-a-lē'an), n. A member of the order Acalepha, or sea-nettles. Spelled also Acalephe.

Acalephas (a-kā-lē'fās), n. pl. [Gr. acalephs, a nettle] A name sometimes applied to a large number of marine animals included in the sub-kingdom Ctenophora, and represented chiefly by the Medusae and their allies, in popular language known as sea-nettles, sea-blubbers, jelly-fish, &c. As a strictly scientific term, Acalephas, however, is not now used, the forms once included under it being now distributed among the Discophora and Lucernaria (both in class Hydrozoa), and the Ctenophora (in class Actinozoa). The most typical of the Acalephas, the Medusae, are gelatinous, free-swimming animals, consisting of an umbrella-shaped disc containing canals which radiate from the centre whence hang the digestive cavity. All have thread cells or articulating organs (see KNEMATOPORE) which discharge minute barbed structures that irritate the skin like the sting of a nettle, hence the name of the group.

Acalephoid (a-kā-lē'foid), a. Like an acaleph or medusa. [Less commonly used than Medusoid.]

Acalydia, Acalycinous (a-kā'lī-dia, ak-llī-in-us), a. [Gr. s, not, and alym, a cup] In bot. without a calyx or flower-cup.

Acanthaceus (ak-a-nā'shus), a. [Gr. akanas, a prickly shrub] In bot. armed with prickles; said of some rigid prickly plants, such as the pine-apple.

Acantha (a-kan'tha), n. [Gr. akantha, a spine or thorn] 1 In bot. a prickle.—2 In zool. a spine or prickly fin. 3 In anat. one of the acute processes of the vertebra, the spine of the tibia, or the spina dorsal.

Acanthaceus (ak-an-thā's-s), n. pl. A nat. order of plants, having for its type the genus Acanthia. The species are common in all tropical countries, and consist of herbaceous plants or shrubs, with opposite leaves and monopetalous corolla. They have mucilaginous and bitter properties.

Acanthaceus (ak-an-thā'shus), a. Armed with prickles, as a plant, belonging to the order Acanthaceae.

Acanthos (a-kan'this), n. [Gr. akanthos, mastic, the juice of a prickly plant that furnished a kind of mastic—akantha, a thorn] The sweet juice of ivy buds.

Acanthothymus (ak-an-thi'thi-ō'sis), n. [Gr. akantha, a thorn, and thymus, a fish] In med. spinous fish-skin disease.

Acanthine (a-kan'thin), a. [See ACANTHUR] Pertaining to or resembling the plant Acanthus, made of material derived from a prickly plant.

Acanthocephala, Acanthocephali (a-kan'-thō-sēf'-a-lia, a-kan-thō-sēf'-a-lē), n. pl. [Gr. akantha, a spine, and kēphalē, the head] An order of mouthless Entozoa, having curved hooks on a retractile proboscis to attach themselves to the tissues of animals.

One species occurs in the liver of the cat, another in the alimentary canal of the swine.

Acantho-derma (a-kan'thō-dēr'ma), n. [Gr. akanthos, a spine, and derma, the hide.] A genus of fossil, cartilaginous, hard-skinned fishes, with strong fin-spines, allied to Balistidae.

Acanthodes (ak-an-thō'déz), n. [Gr. akanthos, a spine, and oides, resemblance.] A genus of fossil fishes, from the carboniferous strata, with strong bony spines.

Acanthodidm (ak-an-thō'di-dé), n. pl. A family of fossil fishes, including the genus Acanthodes (which see).

Acanthoid (a-kan'thoid), a. [Gr. akanthos, a spine.] Spiny.

Acanthophis (a-kan'thō-fis), n. [Gr. akanthos, a prickly, and ophis, a serpent.] A genus of venomous colubrine snakes, the species of which are of small size, reside on dry land, and feed upon frogs, lizards, and small mammals. They have the tail furnished with a horny spur at the end, whence the generic name. A. aetnensis, the death-adder, an inhabitant of Australia, is considered the most venomous reptile of that country.

Acanthoporus (ak-an'thō-for-us), a. [Gr. akanthos, a thorn, and phero, to bear.] Having or producing spines or prickles.

Acanthopteri (ak-an'thōp'tēr-i), n. pl. [Gr. akanthos, a spine, and pteron, a wing.] A group of spine-finned osseous fishes, in modern classifications generally regarded as a sub-order of the order Teleostei, and equivalent to the Acanthopterygii (which see).

Acanthopterous (ak-an'thōp'tēr-us), a. Of or pertaining to the Acanthopteri.

Acanthopterygian (a-kan'thōp'tēr-i-j'i-an), a. Of or pertaining to the Acanthopterygii.

Acanthopterygii (a-kan'thōp'tēr-i-j'i-an), n. An acanthopterygian fish.

Acanthopterygii (a-kan'thōp'tēr-i-j'i-an), n. pl. [Gr. akanthos, a thorn, and pterygion, the fin of a fish, from pteryx, a wing.] One

Corinthian and Composite orders, and said to have been invented by Callimachus, who took the idea of the Corinthian capital from observing an acanthus surrounding a tile-covered basket which had been placed over a tomb.

Acanthyllis (a-kan'thī-lis), n. [Gr. akanthyllis, a kind of finch, dim. from akanthos, the asikin.] A genus of American, Indian, and Australian birds of the swallow family.

Acanthomite, Acanthocone (a-kan'ti-kōn-it, a-kan'ti-kōn), n. [Gr. akanthos, the asikin, and konis, powder, from the greenish colour of its powder.] A variety of prismatic epidote, an almost obsolete synonym of Pistacite. See EPIDOTE.

A capella (ā kā-pel'la), adv. [It.] In the style of church or chapel music: applied to compositions sung without musical accompaniments; thus, mass a capella is a mass purely sung.

Acardia (a-kār'di-a), n. [Gr. a, priv., and kardia, the heart.] The state of being without a heart, as is the case with some foetuses or monstrous births.

Acardiac (a-kār'di-ak), a. [Gr. a, priv., and kardia, the heart.] Without a heart.

Acardiic (a-kār'di-ak), n. A foetus without a heart.

Acaricide (a-kār'i-sid), n. A substance that destroys acarid or mites.

Acarid (ā-kār'id), n. One of the Acarida.

Acarida (a-kār'i-da), n. pl. [Gr. akaris, too short to be cut, small, tiny — a, priv., and kairo, to cut.] A division of Arachnida, including the mites, ticks, and water-mites. Of the true mites, the domestic or cheese mite and the itch-mite are examples. The garden-mites (Trombididae) and spider-mites (Gnathypidae) live upon plants; the wood-mites (Oribatidae) and harvest-ticks (Leptidae) are found amongst moss and herbage, or creeping on trees and stones; while the true ticks (Ixodidae) attach themselves parasitically to the bodies of various mammals, as sheep, oxen, dogs, &c. The water-mites (Hydrachnidae) are parasitic for at least a portion of their existence upon water-beetles and other aquatic insects. The mouth in all is formed for suction, and there is no definite line of demarcation between the unsegmented abdomen and the cephalo-thorax. Also called Acaridae, Acaridans, Acarina, and Monomerocemata.

Acaridm (a-kār'i-dé). See ACARIDA.

Acaridan (a-kār'i-dan), n. One of the Acarida.

Acarina (a-kār'i-na). See ACARIDA.

Acarinar (a-kār'nār), n. [Arab. akhar-en-nahr, extremity of the river, An-nahr, the river, being the Arabic name of the constellation Eridanus.] A bright star of the first magnitude in the constellation Eridanus. Written also Achernar, Akharnar.

Acarpus (a-kār'pus), a. [Gr. akarpous, unfruitful — a, priv., and karpous, fruit.] In bot. not producing fruit; sterile; barren.

Acarus (ā-kār-us), n. The typical genus of insects belonging to the Acarida, comprising the mites and ticks.

Acast (ā-kast), a. An old sea-term for lost or cast away.

Acatalectic (a'kat-a-lek'tik), a. [Gr. akatalektos, not defective at the end — a, priv., kata, down, and légō, to cease.] Not halting short; complete; having the complete number of syllables; as, an acatalectic verse.

Acatalectic (a'kat-a-lek'tik), n. A verse which has the complete number of syllables.

Acatalepsy (a-kat-a-lep-si), n. [Gr. akatalepsia, incomprehensibility — a, priv., kata, down, and lépsis, a taking, from lab, lêp, root of lambanō, to take.] 1. Impossibility of complete discovery or comprehension; incomprehensibility; specifically, a term employed to denote the doctrine held by the ancient academics and sceptics, that human knowledge never amounts to certainty but only to probability. [Rare.] — 2. In med. uncertainty in the diagnosis or prognosis of disease.

Acataleptic (a'kat-a-lep'tik), a. Incomprehensible; not to be known with certainty.

Acataleptic (a'kat-a-lep'tik), n. One who believes that we can know nothing with certainty.

All sceptics and Pyrrhonians were called acataleptics.

Acater (ā-kāt'ér), n. [Norm. and O.E. achatur, acatur, a purchaser. See CATERER.] A purveyor; a caterer. Robin Hood's ballif or acater. B. Jonson.

Acates (ā-kā'ts), n. pl. [Lit. things bought; Fr. achat, a purchase. See ACATER.] Vlands. 'Setting before him variety of acates, and those excellently dressed.' Shelton.

Acatharsia (a-ka-thār'si-a), n. [Gr.] In med. (a) the filth or sordes proceeding from a wound; impurity of blood. (b) Omission of a purgative.

Acatharsy (ā-ka-thār'si), n. Same as Acatharsia.

Acathistus (ak-a-this'tus), n. [L. L.] In the early Greek Ch. a thanksgiving hymn to the Virgin sung at Constantinople on the Saturday of the fifth week of Lent.

Acater (ā-kāt'ér), n. [Lit. place for the acates. See ACATES, ACATER.] The room or place allotted to the keeping of all such provisions as the purveyors purchased for the king.

Acaules (a-kāl'ēs), n. pl. [A, priv., and L. caulis, a stem. See ACALOUS.] Plants which have either a very indistinct stalk or none at all, as lichens, fungi, algae, &c.

Acaulescent (a-kāl-es'sent), a. [Gr. a, priv., and kaulos, a stem.] In bot. stemless; a term applied to a plant in which the stem is apparently absent.

Acauline (a-kāl'in), a. Same as Acaulous.

Acaulous, Acaulose (a-kāl'ūs, a-kāl'ōs), a. [Gr. a, priv., and kaulos, a stalk, the same word as L. caulis, a stem, and E. kale, kail, cauliflower.] In bot. without a conspicuous stem, called caulis, as the Carduus acaulis, or dwarf plume-thistle.

Accable, v. t. [Fr. accabler, to overburden, to overwhelm.] To overwhelm; to oppress; to overburden.

Honours rather raise men's spirits than accable them. Bacon.

Accapitum (ak-kap'i-tum), n. [L. ad, to, and caput, capitis, the head.] In feudal law, money paid by a vassal upon his admission to a feud; the relief due to the chief lord.

Accedas ad curiam (ak-sē'das ad kūr'i-am), n. [L. that you go to the court.] In law, formerly a writ obtainable by one who had received false judgment (or believed so) in a court-baron or hundred-court, issued by the chancery, and directed to the sheriff, directing him to make record of the judgment and return it to the King's Bench or Common Pleas, that its validity in law might be inquired into.

Accede (ak-séd'), v. t. pret. & pp. acceded; ppr. acceding. [Fr. accéder, to assent, from L. accedo — ad, to, and cedo, to move, to yield or give place.] 1. To agree or assent, as to a proposition, or to terms proposed by another; to become a party, by agreeing to the terms of a treaty or convention.

This obvious reflection convinced me of the absurdity of the treaty of Hanover, in 1755, between France and England, to which the Dutch afterwards acceded. Chesterfield.

2. To join or be added.

And vain were courage, learning; all, Till power accede. Shenstone.

3. To succeed, as an heir; to come to by inheritance; as, Queen Victoria acceded to the throne in 1837. — SYN. To agree, assent, consent, comply, acquiesce.

Accelerando (a-chāl'er-an'dō), [It.] In music, a direction indicating that a passage is to be played gradually quicker.

Accelerate (ak-sel'er-āt), v. t. pret. & pp. accelerated; ppr. accelerating. [L. accelerare, acceleratum, to hasten — ad, to, and celer, a, b, c, Spines of the dorsal, anal, and ventral fins of Acanthopterygii.

of the two primary divisions of the osseous fishes established by Cuvier, now forming a group or sub-order of the order Teleostei, and including by far the greatest number of ordinary fishes. They are characterized by having one or more of the first rays of the fins in the form of unjointed spines. In some species the first dorsal fin is represented by a few unconnected spines. The first rays of the anal fins consist of simple spines, and each ventral fin has usually one. The swim-bladder is in all a shut sac. They include the perch, mackerel, gudgeon, weever, stickleback, bass, flying-fish, mullet, braize, tunny, &c. Many fishes belonging to this division are used as food.

Acanthopterygious (a-kan'thōp'tēr-i-j'i-us), a. In zool. having the characters of the Acanthopterygii or spine-finned fishes; belonging to the Acanthopterygii.

Acanthotenthis (a-kan'thō-tē'this), n. [Gr. akanthos, a spine, and tenthis, a cuttle-fish.] A genus of fossil cuttle-fishes occurring in the coltite. The internal bone or osselet (belonging to the part most generally preserved).

Acanthus (ā-kan'thus), a. [Gr. akanthos, a spine.] Spinous.

Acanthurus (ak-an'thū-rus), n. [Gr. akanthos, a spine, and oura, a tail.] A genus of acanthopterygious fishes, distinguished by their compressed shape and lancet-like spines placed on each side of the tail, popularly called surgeon or lancet fishes and thorn-tails.

Acanthus (ā-kan'thus), n. [L. acanthus, Gr. akanthos, from akanthos, a prickly or thorn. See ACACIA.] 1. The plant bear's-breech, or brankurine, a genus of prickly plants, nat. order Acanthaceae. — 2. In arch. an ornament resembling the foliage or leaves of the acanthus, used in capitals of the ch. chain; dh. Sc. lock; g. go; j. job; Vol. I.

n. Fr. ton; ng. sing; TH, then; th, thin;

w, wig; wh, whig; zh, azure. — See KEY.

swift. See Celerity.] 1. To make quicker; to cause to move or advance faster; to hasten; to add to the velocity of; to give a higher rate of progress to; as, to accelerate motion or the rate of motion; to accelerate the transmission of intelligence; to accelerate the growth of a plant, or the progress of knowledge.

Take new beer and put in some quantity of stale beer into it, and see whether it will not accelerate the clarification. Bacon.

Lo! from the dread immensity of space
Returning with accelerated course
The rushing comet to the sun descends. Thomson.

2. To bring nearer in time; to bring about, or help to bring about, more speedily than would otherwise have been the case; as, to accelerate the ruin of a government; to accelerate a battle. — Accelerated motion, in mech. that which continually receives fresh accessions of velocity. If the accessions be always equal in equal times the motion is said to be uniformly accelerated, as that of a heavy body descending by gravity; but if the accessions of velocity in equal times either increase or decrease, the motion is said to be variably accelerated. — Accelerated force is the increased force which a body exerts in consequence of the acceleration of its motion. — Accelerating force is the force which produces an accelerated motion, as gravity.

Acceleration (ak'sel-ér-á'shon), n. The act of accelerating or state of being accelerated; as, (a) the act or process of increasing velocity or progress; the state of being quickened in motion or action. (b) The shortening of the time between the present and the happening of any future event; specifically, in law, the shortening of the time for the vesting in possession of an expectant interest. (c) In physiol. and pathol. increased activity of the functions, particularly of the circulating fluids. — Acceleration of the moon, the increase of the moon's mean angular velocity about the earth, the moon now moving rather faster than in ancient times. This phenomenon has not been fully explained, but it is known to be partly owing to the slow process of diminution which the eccentricity of the earth's orbit is undergoing, and from which there results a slight diminution of the sun's influence on the moon's motions. — Diurnal acceleration of the fixed stars, the apparent greater diurnal motion of the stars than of the sun, arising from the fact that the sun's apparent yearly motion takes place in a direction contrary to that of his apparent daily motion. The stars thus seem each day to anticipate the sun by nearly 3 minutes 56 seconds of mean time. — Acceleration of a planet, the greater rapidity with which it moves as it approaches the sun. — Acceleration and retardation of the tides, certain deviations between the time of the actual occurrence of high water at any place and what it would be if it occurred after the lapse of a uniform mean interval. In spring and neap tides the sun's action does not alter the time of high water, as in the former case the solar and lunar tides are synchronous, while in the latter the time of actual or lunar low water and of solar high water are the same. But in the first and third quarters of the moon there is acceleration or priming of high water, as the solar wave is to the west of the lunar; and in the second and fourth quarters there is retardation or lagging, for an analogous reason.

Accelerative (ak-sel-ér-át-iv), a. Tending to accelerate; adding to velocity; quickening progression.

Accelerator (ak-sel-ér-át-ér), n. One who or that which accelerates; a hastener. Hence—(a) A post-office van. (b) In anat. a muscle which contracts to expel or accelerate the passage of the urine. (c) In photog. a name given to any substance which shortens the time of exposure either in the camera or the printing frame.

Acceleratory (ak-sel-ér-á-to-ri), a. Accelerating or tending to accelerate; quickening motion.

Accend (ak-sen-d'), v.t. [L. accendo, accensum, to kindle—ad, and candeo, to be white, to shine, from root can, as in canus, hoary, white: the same stem gives also E. candle, candid, &c.] To set on fire; to kindle.

Our devotion, if sufficiently accended, would burn up innumerable books of this sort. Dr. H. More.

Accensory (ak-sen-dent), n. An accensor (which see).

Accendibility (ak-sen-d'i-bil'i-ti), n. The quality of being accendible.

Accendible (ak-sen-d'i-bl), a. [See ACCEND.] Capable of being inflamed or kindled.

Accension (ak-sen-shon), n. The act of kindling or setting on fire, or the state of being kindled; inflammation.

Accensor (ak-sen-sér), n. [See ACCEND.] One who sets on fire or kindles; specifically, in the R. Cath. Ch. a minister or servant whose business it is to light and trim the candles and tapers.

Accent (ak-sent), n. [L. accentus, an accent,—ad, to, and canto, cantum, to sing. See CHANT.] 1. A superior stress or force of voice upon certain syllables of words, which distinguishes them from the other syllables. Many English words, as aspir-a-tion, have two accents, a secondary and primary. In uttering the word aspiration we observe the first and third syllables are distinguished—the third by a full sound, which constitutes the primary accent; the first, by a degree of force in the voice which is less than that of the primary accent, but evidently greater than that which falls on the second and fourth syllables. Some words, as in-con-pre-hen-si-bil'i-ty, have two secondary or subordinate accents. When the full accent falls on a vowel, that vowel has its long sound, as in vo-cal; but when it falls on an articulation or consonant, the preceding vowel is short, as in hab'it. Accent alone regulates English verse. Accent must not be confounded with emphasis, the latter being used in reference to some one word or part of a sentence to which a speaker wishes to draw attention, by giving it a more marked pronunciation. 2. A mark or character used in writing to direct the stress of the voice in pronunciation, or to mark a particular tone, length of vowel sound, or the like. There is commonly only one such sign used to mark the stress or accent in English, except in works on elocution, in which are employed the three Greek accents, namely the acute ('), the grave (`), and the circumflex (~ or ^). In elocution the first shows when the voice is to be raised, and is called the raising inflection; the second, when it is to be depressed, and is called the falling inflection; and the third, when the vowel is to be uttered with an undulating sound, and is called the compound or waving inflection. — 3. A peculiar or characteristic modulation or modification of the voice, such as that found in a given district or in a particular rank of society, or as expressive of passions or sentiments; manner of speaking or pronouncing. 'A perfect accent.' Thackeray.

The tender accents of a woman's cry. Prior.
Your accent is something finer than you could purchase in so removed a dwelling. Shak.
4. Words, language, or expressions in general. Words, on your wings, to heaven her accents bear, Such words as heaven alone is fit to hear. Dryden.
5. In music, a stress or emphasis given to certain notes or parts of bars in a composition, divided into two kinds—grammatical, and rhetorical or aesthetic. The first is perfectly regular in its occurrence, always falling on the first part of a bar; the aesthetic accent is irregular, and depends on taste and feeling. — 6. In math. (a) In alg. a mark used in order to avoid the confusion arising from the use of many letters in an algebraical problem or a diagram, and also on other accounts. In this way the same letter or letters, being distinguished by accents, may be used to represent different magnitudes or quantities; thus abc and a'b'c' may stand for magnitudes as different in value as those represented by different letters. (b) In geom. and trigon. an accent at the right hand of a number indicating minutes of a degree; two accents, seconds, &c.; as, 20° 10' 30" = 20 degrees, 10 minutes, 30 seconds. (c) In menur. and engin. a mark used to denote feet and inches; thus, 3' 6" = 3 feet, 6 inches.

Accent (ak-sent'), v.t. 1. To express the accent of; to pronounce or utter with a particular stress or modulation of the voice; as, to accent a word properly. — 2. To give expression to; to utter. Congeal'd with grief, can scarce implore Strength to accent, Here my Albertus lies. Dr. Wotton.
3. To mark with an accent or accents; as, to accent a word in order to indicate its pronunciation. — Accented parts of a bar, in music, those parts of the bar on which the stress falls, as the first and third parts of the bar in common time.

Accentor (ak-sen-tér), n. [L. accentor, one who sings with—ad, to, and canto, to sing.] 1. In music, one that sings the leading part. 2. A genus of insectorial birds, family Sylviidae, sub-family Accentorinae. A. modularis is our well-known hedge-sparrow, hedge-warbler, shuffle-wing, or duncock. See HEDGE-SPARROW.

Accentorins (ak-sen-té-rí-né), n. pl. A sub-family of dentirotal birds, of the order Insectores and family Sylviidae, including the genus Accentor.

Accentual (ak-sen-tú-al), a. Pertaining to accent; rhythmical.

The term figure which we now employ to distinguish floric from simple melody was used to denote that which was simply rhythmical or accentual. W. Mason.

Accentuate (ak-sen-tú-át), v.t. pret. & pp. accentuated; ppr. accentuating. To mark or pronounce with an accent or with accents; to place an accent or accents on.

Accentuation (ak-sen-tú-á'shon), n. The act of accentuating, or state of being accentuated; the act of pronouncing or marking with an accent or accents; the act of giving accent.

Accept (ak-sept'), v.t. [L. acceptare, freq. of accipio, acceptum, to take to one's self, to accept—ad, to, and cipio, to take.] 1. To take or receive, as something offered; to receive with approbation or favour; as, he made an offer which was accepted. If you accept them, then their worth is great. Shak. Bless, Lord, his substance, and accept the work of his hands. Deut. xxxiii. 11.

2. To take what presents itself or what befalls one; to accommodate one's self to; as, to accept the situation. They carry it off well, these fair moving mountains, as like all French women accept frankly their natural fortunes. Fraser's Magazine.

3. To listen favourably to; to grant. Sweet prince, accept their suit. Shak.

4. To receive or admit and agree to; to accede or assent to; as, to accept a treaty, a proposal, an amendment, an excuse: often followed by of; as, accept of the terms. — 5. To receive in a particular sense; to understand; as, how is this phrase to be accepted? — 6. In com. to acknowledge, especially by signature, as calling for payment, and thus to promise to pay; as, to accept a bill of exchange. — 7. In a deliberative body, to receive in discharge of a duty committed; as, the report was accepted. Accept (ak-sept'), n. Consent or acceptance.

We will suddenly Pass our accept and peremptory answer. Shak. Acceptable (ak-sep'ta-bl), a. Capable, worthy, or sure of being accepted or received with pleasure; hence, pleasing to a receiver; gratifying; agreeable; welcome; as, an acceptable present. The woman whom thou mad'st to be my help So fit, so acceptable, so divine. Milten.

Acceptableness, Acceptability (ak-sep'ta-bl-nés, ak-sep'ta-bil'i-ti), n. The quality of being acceptable or agreeable to a receiver, or to a person with whom one has intercourse. Acceptably (ak-sep'ta-bl), adv. In an acceptable manner; in a manner to please or give satisfaction. Let us have grace whereby we may serve God acceptably. Heb. xii. 14.

Acceptance (ak-sep'tans), n. 1. The act of accepting; (a) the act of taking or receiving anything offered; receiving with approbation or satisfaction; favourable reception. 'Such with him finds no acceptance.' Milten. They shall come up with acceptance on my altar. Is. lx. 7.

(b) The act of agreeing to terms or proposals, and thereby becoming bound; the act of taking some obligation on one's self; specifically, in law, an agreeing to the offer or contract of another by some act which binds the person in law; thus, if a person receiving an estate in remainder takes rent on a lease made by his predecessor, this is an acceptance of the terms of the lease, and binds the party receiving to abide by the terms of the lease; in com. an engagement by the person on whom a bill of exchange is drawn to pay the bill, usually made by the person writing the word 'accepted' across the bill and signing his name, or simply by writing his name across or at the end of the bill. Hence—2. A bill of exchange that has been accepted, or the sum contained in it. — 3. The sense in which a word or expression is understood; signification; meaning; acceptance. 'An assertion under the common acceptance of it not only false but odious." South.—Acceptance with God, in theol. forgiveness of sins and reception into God's favour.

Acceptancy (ak-sep'tan-si), n. Act of accepting; acceptance.

Here's a proof of gift.

Acceptation (ak-sep'tā-shon), n. 1. The act of accepting or receiving; also, kind reception; a receiving with favour or approbation; a state of being acceptable; favourable regard. 'Coldness of acceptation.' Sir P. Sidney.

This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation. Tim. i. 15.

2. The meaning or sense in which a word or expression is understood or generally received; as, a term is to be used according to its usual acceptation.

My words in common acceptation could never give this provocation. Gay.

Accepted (ak-sep'ted), a. Acceptable.

Behold, now is the accepted time; behold, now is the day of salvation. 2 Cor. vi. 2.

Acceptor, Acceptor (ak-sep'ter, ak-sep'tor), n. 1. A person who accepts; specifically, in com. the person who accepts a bill of exchange so as to bind himself to pay the sum contained in it.—2. One who favours unduly; a respecter.

God is no accepter of persons, neither riches nor poverty are a means to procure his favour. Chillingworth.

Acceptilation† (ak-sep'ti-lā'shon), n. [L. acceptilatio, acceptationis—acceptum, a receipt, and latio, a carrying, from fero, latum, to carry.] 1. In civil and Scots law, the verbal extinction of a verbal contract, with a declaration that the debt has been paid when it has not, or the acceptance of something merely imaginary in satisfaction of a verbal contract. Wharton. Hence—2. Free remission or forgiveness, as of sins.

Our justification which comes by Christ is by imputation and acceptilation, by grace and favour. Tyr. Taylor.

Acceptiō† (ak-sep'tā-shon), n. 1. The received sense of a word; acceptation.

That this hath been esteemed the due and proper acceptiō of this word, I shall testify. Hammond.

2. The act of favouring unequally; preference. 'Acceptiō of persons.' Wicliffe.

Acceptive† (ak-sep'tiv), a. Ready to accept.

The people generally are very acceptive and apt to applaud any meritorious work. B. Fensom.

Acceptor. See ACCEPTOR.

Acceptress (ak-sep'trees), n. A female who accepts. [Rare.]

Access† (ak-sēs'), v. t. [L. accessus, to summon.] To call out or forth; to summon, as an army. Hall.

Access (ak'sēs), n. [L. accessus, from accedo, to come near, to approach. See ACCEDE.] 1. A coming to; near approach; admittance; admission; as, to gain access to a prince.

I did repel his letters, and denied His access to me. Shak.

2. The means or way by which a thing may be approached; specifically, in arch., a passage in a building communicating between two or more apartments; a corridor; as, the access is by a neck of land.

All access was througed. Milton.

3. Admission to sexual intercourse.

4. Addition; increase; accession.

1. from the influence of thy looks, receive access in every virtue. Milton.

5. The attack or return of a fit or paroxysm of disease, as of a fever; accession.

The first access looked like an apoplexy. R. Burnet.

Accessarily (ak'sēs-ā-ri-lī), adv. In the manner of an accessory; accessorially.

Accessariness (ak'sēs-ā-ri-nes), n. State of being accessory; accessorialness.

Accessory (ak'sēs-ā-ri), n. An accomplice; an accessory.

Accessory (ak'sēs-ā-ri), a. 1. Additional; accessory.

Among many secondary and accessory causes that support monarchy, these are not of least reckoning. Milton.

2. Acceding or contributing to a crime; as, he was accessory to rebellion. See ACCESSORY.

Accessibility (ak'sēs-ā-bil'i-ti), n. The condition or quality of being accessible or of admitting approach.

Accessible (ak-sēs-ā-bil), a. Capable of being approached or reached; easy of access; approachable; attainable; as, an accessible town or mountain. 'Accessible by a bold and sudden attack.' Sir W. Scott. 'Most frankly accessible, most affable . . . most sociable.' Barrow. 'Proofs accessible to all the world.' Buckle.

There is a very great amount of labour employed in rendering the product accessible to those for whose use it is intended. J. S. Mill.

Accessibly (ak-sēs-ā-bil), adv. So as to be accessible.

Accession (ak-sēs-shon), n. [L. accessio. See ACCEDE.] 1. The act of acceding; the act of agreeing or assenting, as to proposals; the act of becoming joined, as to a party; as, his accession to my demands was long postponed; a king's accession to a confederacy. 2. Increase by something added; that which is added; augmentation; as, an accession of wealth or territory.

The only accession which the Roman Empire received was the province of Britain. Gibbon.

3. The act of arriving at a throne, an office, or dignity; as, the accession of Queen Victoria; the accession of the house of Stuart.

Nobody could pretend that the law had been altered since his (William's) accession. Macaulay.

4. In law, a mode of acquiring property, by which the owner of a corporeal substance, which receives an addition by growth or by labour, has a right to the thing added or the improvement, provided the thing is not changed into a different species. Thus the owner of a cow becomes the owner of her calf.—5. In med. the attack, approach, or commencement of a disease.—Dead of accession, in Scots law, a deed executed by the creditors of a bankrupt, by which they approve of a trust given by their debtor for the general behoof, and bind themselves to concur in the plans proposed for extricating his affairs.

Accessional (ak-sēs-shon-al), a. Additional. [Rare.]

The specific and accessional perfections which the human understanding derives from it. Coleridge.

Accessit (ak-sēs-ait), n. [L., he came near.] In English universities, a term applied to a certificate for a person second in merit.

Accessive (ak-sēs-iv), a. Additional. Hopkins.

Accessorial (ak-sēs-sō-ri-al), a. Pertaining to an accessory; as, accessorial agency; accessorial guilt.

Accessorially (ak'sēs-sō-ri-lī), adv. In the manner of an accessory; not as principal but as a subordinate agent.

Accessoriness (ak'sēs-sō-ri-nes), n. The state of being accessory, or of being or acting in a secondary character.

Accessory (ak'sēs-sō-ri), a. [L. accessorius, from accedo, accedo. See ACCEDE.] 1. [Of persons.] Acceding; contributing; aiding in producing some effect, or acting in subordination to the principal agent; usually in a bad sense; as, John was accessory to the felony.—2. [Of things.] Contributing to a general effect; aiding in certain acts or effects in a secondary manner; belonging to something else as principal; accompanying; as, accessory sounds in music; accessory muscles.—Accessory valves, in zool. small additional valves, as those placed near the umbones of the genus Pholad among Mollusca.—Accessory action, in Scots law, an action in some degree subversive or ancillary to another action.—Accessory obligation, in Scots law, an obligation annexed to another obligation. Thus, an obligation for the regular payment of interest is accessory to the obligation to pay the capital.

Accessory (ak'sēs-sō-ri), n. 1. In law, one who is guilty of a felony, not by committing the offence in person or as principal, but by being in some way concerned therein, as by advising or commanding another to commit the crime, or by concealing the offender, or in any way helping him to escape punishment. An accessory before the fact is one who counsels or commands another to commit a felony, and is not present when the act is executed; after the fact, when one receives and conceals, or in any way assists, the offender, knowing him to have committed a felony. In treason there are no accessories, all implicated being treated as principals. See ABETTER.—2. That which accedes or belongs to something else, as its principal; something that contributes to an effect; an accompaniment. 'The aspect and accessories of a den of banditti.' Carlyle. Specifically, in the fine arts, a secondary object introduced as illustrative or explanatory of the scene, or contributing to the general effect and harmony of the piece; generally, anything introduced into a work which is not absolutely necessary. Vases, columns, armour, &c., in historical paintings and portraits, are accessories.—SYN. Accomplice, abettor, assistant, coadjutor, ally.

Acciaccatura (at'chak-ka-tō'ra), n. [It.] In music, a grace-note one semibreve before the note to which it is prefixed.

Accidence (ak'si-dens), n. [A corruption of accidents. See ACCIDENT.] That part of grammar which treats of the accidents or inflection of words; a small book containing the rudiments of grammar.

I do confess I do want eloquence, And never yet did learn nice accidence. John Taylor.

Accident (ak'si-dent), n. [L. accidens, falling—ad, and cado, to fall, whence casus, casus, casus, casus, &c.] 1. Chance or what happens by chance; an event which proceeds from an unknown cause, or is an unusual effect of a known cause, and therefore not expected; often in the sense of an unforeseen and undesigned injury to human life or limb; casualty; mishap; in second extract equivalent to specimen of an injury. All of them, in his opinion, owe their being to fate, accident, or the blind action of stupid matter. Dwight.

2. Anything which takes place or begins to exist without an efficient intelligent cause and without design. 'The accident of an accident.' Lord Thurloe.

In his (the atheist's) eyes the universe . . . is but a happily ordered accident. Dr. T. Brown.

3. In logic, a property or quality of a thing which is not essential to it, nor is one of its invariable signs; a predicable which may be present or not, the essence of the species remaining the same; as, whiteness in paper. All qualities are called accidents, in opposition to substances, as sweetness, softness, &c. 4.† In gram. something belonging to a word, but not essential to it, as gender, number, and case. See ACCIDENT.—5. In her. a point or mark, not essential to a coat of arms.—SYN. Chance, contingency, casualty, misfortune.

Accidental (ak'si-dent-al), a. 1. Happening by chance or accident, or unexpectedly; taking place not according to the usual course of things; casual; fortuitous; opposed to constant, regular, or intended; as, an accidental visit.—2. Non-essential; not necessarily belonging; adventitious; as, songs are accidental to a play.—Accidental colours, in optics, the imaginary complementary colours seen after fixing the eye for a short time on a bright-coloured object, and then turning it suddenly to a white or light-coloured surface. If the object is blue, the accidental colour is yellow; if red, green; thus, if we look fixedly at a red wafer on a piece of paper, and then turn the eye to another part of the paper, a green spot is seen.—Accidental lights, in painting, secondary lights which are not accounted for by the prevalent effect; effects of light other than ordinary daylight, such as the rays of the sun darting through a cloud, or between the leaves of a thicket of trees, or the effects of moonlight, candle-light, or burning bodies.—Accidental point, in persp. that point in which a right line drawn from the eye parallel to another given right line, cuts the picture or plane. Thus, suppose AB to be the line given in perspective, OFE the perspective plane, D the eye, CD the line parallel to AB; then is C the accidental point.—Accidental, Casual, Fortuitous, Contingent, Incidental. Accidental is applied to what falls out, as it were, by chance, and not in the regular course of events. Casual is applied to such occurrences as, coming by chance, have no immediate consequences beyond themselves: it is the accidental combined with the unimportant. Fortuitous (almost equal to accidental) is applied to what occurs without any known cause, and in opposition to what has been foreseen. A thing is contingent when it is such that, considered in itself, it may or may not happen, but is dependent for its happening on something else. Incidental is applied to what falls into some regular course of things, but forms no essential part thereof.

This is accidental to a state of religion, and therefore ought to be reckoned among the ordinary difficulties of it.

These are casual breaks in the general system.

As chance is the operator assigned in a fortuitous concurrence of atoms, we would know what this chance, this wish and ingenious artist, is.

With an infinite being nothing can be contingent.

By some persons religious duties appear to be regarded as an incidental business.

Accidental (ak-si-dent'al), n. Anything happening, occurring, or appearing accidentally, or as if accidentally; a casualty; a property not essential. [Rare.]

He conceived it just that accidentals . . . should sink with the substance of the accusation.

Conceive, as much as you can, of the essentials of any subject, before you consider its accidentals.

Specifically, (a) in music, a sharp, flat, or natural which does not occur in the clef, and which implies some change of key or modulation different from that in which the piece began. (b) In her, an additional mark in a coat of arms not essential to its character. (c) In med. texture resulting from morbid action: chiefly employed in this sense by French writers, but adopted by some English. (d) In painting, one of those fortuitous or chance effects, occurring from luminous rays falling on certain objects, by which they are brought into stronger light than they otherwise would be, and their shadows are consequently of greater intensity.

Accidentalism (ak-si-dent'al-izm), n. 1. The condition or quality of being accidental; accidental character.—2. That which is accidental; accidental effect; specifically, in painting, the effect produced by accidental rays of light. Ruskin. See ACCIDENTAL, n. (d).

Accidentality (ak-si-dent'al-i-ti), n. The quality of being accidental; accidental character.

I wish in short to connect by a moral copula natural history with political history, or, in other words, to make history scientific, and science historical—to take from history its accidentality, and from science its fatalism.

Accidentally (ak-si-dent'al-i), adv. In an accidental manner; by chance; casually; fortuitously; not essentially.

I conclude choler accidentally bitter and acrimonious, but not in itself.

Accidentalness (ak-si-dent'al-nes), n. The quality of being accidental.

Accidentary (ak-si-dent'al-ri), a. Accidental.

Accidentary† (ak-si-dent'al-ri), a. Pertaining to or learning the accident.

You know the word 'sacerdotes' to signify priests, and not the lay-people, which every accidentary boy in schools knoweth as well as you.

Accipenser. [Erroneous spelling.] Same as Acipenser.

Accipient† (ak-sip'i-ent), n. [L. accipiens, accipiens, ppr. of accipio. See ACCEPT.] A receiver.

Accipiter (ak-sip'i-tér), n. [L. accipiter, a bird of prey, not from accipio, to receive, to take, but from root ak, signifying sharpness and swiftness, and pet, to fly, like Gr. okypetros, swift-winged.] 1. One of the order of birds Accipitres or Raptores. See RAPTOR.—2. In swy, a bandage applied over the nose: so called from its resemblance to the claw of a hawk.

Accipitrary† (ak-sip'i-tra-ri), n. A falconer. Nash.

Accipitres (ak-sip'i-trés), n. pl. [See ACCIPITER.] The name given by Linnæus and Cuvier to the rapacious birds, now usually called Raptores (which see).

Accipitrine (ak-sip'i-tri-né), n. pl. The hawks, a sub-family of raptorial birds, family Falconidae, with the wings shorter than the tail, and the bill short and hooked from the base. They pounce on their prey when flying, and mostly inhabit cold climates.

Accipitrine (ak-sip'i-trin), a. [See ACCIPITER.] Of or pertaining to the Accipitres or raptorial birds; seizing; rapacious; as, the accipitrine order of birds.

Accismus (ak-si-s'mus), n. [L. from Gr. akismos, coyness, affectation.] In rhet. a feigned refusal; an ironical dissimulation. Smart.

Accite† (ak-sit'), v. t. [L. ad, and cito, freq. of cicō, citum, to call. See CITE.] 1. To call; to cite; to summon.

He by the senate is accited home.

2. To incite; to prompt; to move.

What accites your thoughts to think so?

[In this example perhaps a misprint for accide.]

Acclaim (ak-klam'), v. t. [L. acclamo—ac for ad, and clamo, to cry out, whence claim, clamour, &c.] 1. To applaud. [Rare.]

How gladly did they spend their breath in acclaiming thee.

2. To declare or salute by acclamation.

While the shouting crowd acclaims thee king of traitors.

Acclaim (ak-klam'), v. i. To applaud.

Acclaim (ak-klam'), n. A shout of joy; acclamation.

The vaulted firmament acclaims thee king of traitors.

With loud acclamations, and vast applause is rent.

Acclamate† (ak-klam-at'), v. t. [L. acclamo, acclamatum. See ACCCLAIM.] To applaud.

Acclamate (ak-klam-at'), n. A shout of joy; acclamation.

Acclamation (ak-klam-at'shon), n. [L. acclamatio. See ACCCLAIM.] 1. A shout or other demonstration of applause made by a multitude, indicating joy, hearty assent, approbation, or good wishes. Acclamations are expressed by hurrahs, by clapping of hands, and often by repeating such cries as Long live the queen! Vive l'empereur! Vive la république! &c.

Those Presbyterian members of the House of Commons who had been expelled by the army, returned to their seats, and were hailed with acclamations by great multitudes.

When they (the Anglo-Saxons) consented to anything it was rather in the way of acclamation than by the exercise of a deliberate vote.

2. In archæol. a representation in sculpture or on medals of people expressing joy.

Acclamatory (ak-klam'a-to-ri), a. Expressing joy or applause by acclamation.

Acclimatization (ak-klam-at'shon), n. [Fr.] Acclimatization (which see). 'The Acclimatization Society of Nantes.' Times newspaper.

Acclimate (ak-klam-at'), v. t. pret. & pp. acclimated; ppr. acclimating. [Fr. acclimater, to acclimate. See CLIMATE.] To habituate to a foreign climate; to render proof against the prejudicial influences of a foreign climate; to acclimatize: more especially applied to the adaptation of human beings to new climates; as, to acclimate settlers; to acclimate one's self. 'Natives and acclimated Europeans.' J. Crawford.

Acclimated (ak-klam-at'), n. Acclimation. [Rare.]

Acclimation (ak-klam-at'shon), n. The process of acclimating, or state of being acclimated; acclimatization.

Acclimatization (ak-klam-at-iz'shon), n. The act or process of acclimatizing, or state of being acclimatized; the modification of physical constitution which enables a race or individual to live in health in a foreign country. [Some writers use this word only with regard to animals and plants, using acclimation when speaking of man.]

Acclimatize, Acclimatise (ak-klam-at-iz), v. t. pret. & pp. acclimatized; ppr. acclimatizing. To accustom or habituate to a foreign climate; to adapt for existence in a foreign climate, especially to adapt a race or stock for permanent existence and propagation; as, to acclimatize plants; to acclimatize animals. 'Young soldiers, not yet acclimatized, die rapidly here.' Times newspaper.

Acclimature (ak-klam-at-ur), n. Act of acclimating, or state of being acclimated. [Rare.]

Acclinal (ak-klam-at'), a. [L. acclino, to bend up. See ACCLIVITY.] In geol. leaning or bending up, as the slopes of a stratum towards an anticlinal axis. See cut ANTI-CLINAL.

Acclive† (ak-kliv'), a. [L. acclivus, acclivus, sloping.] Rising; steep. 'The way easily ascending, hardly so acclive as a deak.'

Aubrey.

Acclivous (ak-kliv'us), a. Rising with a slope; acclivous. Is. Taylor.

Acclivity (ak-kliv'i-ti), n. [L. acclivitas, an acclivity—ac for ad, to, and clivus, a slope, from root cl seen in clino, inclino, to incline. Gr. klino, to bend, incline, E. lean (which see).] A slope or inclination of the earth, as the side of a hill, considered as ascending, in opposition to declivity, or a side descending; specifically, in fort. the talus of a rampart.

Acclivous (ak-kliv'us), a. [L. acclivus, acclivus, sloping. See ACCLIVITY.] Rising, as a hill with a slope.

Accloy†, Accloyet (ak-klot'), v. t. [See CLOY.] To cloy; to encumber; to embarrass with superfluity.

(It) with uncomely weeds the gentle wave accloyes.

Accoyl (ak-koi'), v.t. [O.Fr. accouillir (Mod. Fr. accueillir), to gather together—ac for ad, to, and coillir (L. colligere), to collect. See COIL.] To gather together; to crowd.

About the caudron many cookies accoyd. Spenser.

Accredit (ak-kred'it), v.t. [Fr. accréditer, to give authority or credit to, to accredit—L. ad, to, and credo, credidit, to trust. See CRED.] 1. To repose confidence in; to trust; to esteem or have a high opinion of. 'Their most considerable and accredited ministers.' Burke.

His party will . . . protect and accredit him, in spite of conduct the most contradictory to their own principles. Sir W. Scott.

2. To confer credit or authority on; to stamp with authority.

Being moved as well by these reasons as by many other which I could tell you, which accredit and fortify mine opinion. Shelton.

I am better pleased indeed that he censures some things than I should have been with unmitigated commendation; for his censure to which he is accredited his praises. Croft.

Hence, specifically—3. To send with credentials, as an envoy.

They returned to court with no further pretension to power or influence than an ambassador in our days when he returns from the country to which he is accredited. J. White.

4. To believe; to put credit in.

He accredited and repeated stories of apparitions, and witchcraft, and possession, so silly, as well as monstrous, that they might have nauseated the coarsest appetite for wonder. Southey.

Accreditation (ak-kred'it-ā'shon), n. The act of accrediting, or state of being accredited.

Accresco (ak-kres'), v.i. [L. accresco, acrescitur, to increase, to grow to—ad, to, and creo, to grow, increase.] To accrue (which see).

Accrescence (ak-kres'sens), n. Act of increasing; gradual growth or increase; accretion.

The silent accrescence of belief from the unwatched depositions of a general, never contradicted hearsay. Coleridge.

Accrescent (ak-kres'sent), a. [L. accrescens, acrescens, ppr. of accresco. See ACCRESCE.] Increasing; growing; specifically, in bot. applied to the parts of the calyx or corolla which grow larger after flowering.

Accrete (ak-kret'), v.i. [See ACCRESCE.] 1. To grow by accretion; to gather additions from without [Rare].—2. To be added to; to accrue. [Rare.]

The House (of Commons), representing every class, would be stronger, more dignified, better fitted to exercise that vast, that almost extensive power, as sovereign senate, which is day by day accreting to it more rapidly. Spectator newspaper.

Accrete (ak-kret'), a. In bot. grown together. Accretion (ak-kret'shon), n. [L. accretio, accretionis, increase, from accresco, acrescitur. See ACCRESCE.] 1. The act of accreting or accreting; a growing to; an increase by natural growth; an addition; specifically, an increase by an accession of parts externally.

A mineral or unorganized body can undergo no change save by the operation of mechanical or chemical forces; and any increase of its bulk is due to the addition of like particles to its exterior: it augments not by growth but by accretion. Owen.

2. In med. the growing together of parts naturally separate, as the fingers or toes.—3. The thing added; an accession: commonly used in the plural, and restricted to those accessions made slowly and gradually by some external force.

As careful peasants with incessant toil, Bring earth to vines in bare and rocky soil, So those accretions to the mind will bring.

Whence fond regard and just esteem will spring. Crabbe.

4. In law, the adhering of property to something else, by which the owner of one thing becomes possessed of a right to another: generally applied to the increase which sometimes takes place on land situated on the bank of a river or the sea. When the accretion is by small and imperceptible degrees it belongs to the owner of the land immediately behind, but if it is sudden and considerable it belongs to the crown. In Soots law, the term is applied to the rendering any right, originally defective or imperfect, complete, by some posterior act on the part of him from whom the right is derived. Thus, where one not infert conveys land, giving a precept of infertment which is acted on, the subsequent infertment of the seller renders valid the prior infertment of the purchaser.

Accretive (ak-kret'iv), a. Of or pertaining to accretion; increasing by growth; growing; adding to by growth. 'The accretive motion of plants.' Glanville.

Accriminate (ak-krim'in-āt), v.t. [L. ad, to, and crimino, criminator, to accuse of crime, from crimen, a crime.] To charge with a crime.

Accrimination (ak-krim'in-ā'shon), n. Accusation. [Rare.]

Accroach (ak-kroch'), v.i. [Fr. accrocher, to fix on a hook, from croc, crochet, a hook, from a root both Teutonic and Celtic. See CROOK.] 1. To hook, or draw to one's self, as with a hook.—2. In old laws, to assume the exercise of royal prerogatives.

Accroachment (ak-kroch'ment), n. Act of accroaching; an attempt to assume the royal prerogative; an encroachment.

Accrue (ak-kro'), v.i. pret. & pp. accrued; ppr. accruing. [Fr. accruer, n. increase, accréd, pp. of accroître, to increase; O.Fr. accroître, acrestre, acresser; Pr. acressier, from L. accrescere, to increase, from ac for ad, to, and creo, to grow, seen also in creant, decrease, increase.] 1. To grow; to increase; to augment.

And though power failed, her courage did accrue. Spenser.

2. To be added, as increase, profit, or damage; to be gained or obtained; to proceed or spring; as, a profit accrues to government from the coinage of copper; a loss accrues from the coinage of gold and silver.—Accruing costs, in law, expenses incurred after judgment.

Accrue (ak-kro'), n. Something that accedes to or follows the property of another. Accrued (ak-krod'), a. In her. full-grown: a term sometimes applied to trees.

Accrument (ak-kro'ment), n. That which accrues; addition; increase. Jer. Taylor. [Rare.]

Accubation (ak-kū-bā'shon), n. [L. accubatio, accubationis, a reclining, from accubo, to recline—ad, to, and cubo, to lie down, from root cub or cumb, as in accumb, recumb, &c.] A lying or reclining on a couch, as practised by the ancients at meals, the parties placing themselves with the head resting on a pillow or on the elbow, and the feet of one extended behind the back of another. 'Which gesture . . . cannot be avoided in the laws of accubation.' Sir T. Browne.

Accumb (ak-kumb'), v.i. [L. accumbo, to lie down—ad, to, and cumbo, a nasalized form of cubo, to lie down. See ACCUBATION.] To recline, as at table. Bailey.

Accumbency (ak-kumb'en-si), n. State of being accumbent or reclining.

Accumbent (ak-kumb'ent), a. [L. accumbens, ppr. of accumbo, from cubo. See ACCUBATION.] 1. Lying or reclining, as the ancients at their meals.

The Roman recumbent, or more properly accumbent posture in eating was introduced after the first Punic war. Arbuthnot.

2. In bot. lying against anything; used in opposition to incumbent, or lying upon something; as, accumbent cotyledons.

Accumbent Ovule
(Thlaspi arvense).

Accumbent (ak-kum'bent), a. One who reclines, as at meals; one placed at a dinner-table.

A penance must be done by every accumbent in dining out the passage through all these dishes. Sp. Hall.

Accumber (ak-kum'ber), a. Fitted or intended for accubation. 'Accumber places.' Sir T. Browne.

Accumulate (ak-kū'mū-lāt), v.t. pret. & pp. accumulated; ppr. accumulating. [L. accumulo, accumulatus, to heap up—ad, to, and cumulus, a heap. See CUMULATE.] To heap up; to pile; to amass; to collect or bring together; as, to accumulate earth or stones; to accumulate causes of misery; to accumulate wealth.

In the seventeenth century a statesman who was at the head of affairs might easily, and without giving scandal, accumulate in no long time an estate amply sufficient to support a dukedom. Macaulay.

SYN. To collect, pile up, amass, gather, aggregate, heap together.

Accumulate (ak-kū'mū-lāt), v.i. To grow to a great size, number, or quantity; to increase greatly; as, public evils accumulate.

Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,

Where wealth accumulates, and misery decays. Goldsmith.

Accumulation (ak-kū'mū-lāt), a. Collected into a mass or quantity; increased; intensified. 'A more accumulate degree of felicity.' South.

Accumulation (ak-kū'mū-lā'shon), n. 1. The act of accumulating; the state of being accumulated; an amassing; a collecting together.

It is essential to the idea of wealth to be susceptible of accumulation; things which cannot, after being produced, be kept for some time before being used are never, I think, regarded as wealth. J. S. Mill.

Specifically, in law, the concurrence of several titles to the same thing, or of several circumstances to the same proof.—2. That which is accumulated; as, a great accumulation of sand at the mouth of a river.—Accumulation of degrees, in universities, the taking of several degrees together, or at smaller intervals than usual, or than is generally allowed by the rules.—Accumulation of power, a term applied to that amount of force or capacity for motion which exists in some machines at the end of intervals of time, during which the velocity of the moving body has been constantly accelerated.

Accuse (ak-kûz'), v. t. pret. & pp. accused; ppr. accusing. [L. accuso, to call to account, blame, indict — ad, to, and causa, cause, process. See CAUSE.] 1. To charge with, or declare to have committed a crime either by plaintiff or complaint, information, indictment, or impeachment; to charge with an offence against the laws, judicially or by a public process; as, to accuse one of a high crime or misdemeanour. — 2. To charge with a fault; to blame; to censure.

Their thoughts in the meanwhile accusing or else excusing one another. Rom. ii. 15.
Accuse not nature; she hath done her part. Milton.

Followed by of before the subject of accusation, formerly sometimes by for.

The professors are accused of the ill practices. Addison.

Never send up the leg of a fowl at supper while there is a cat or dog in the house that can be accused for running away with it. Swift.

— Accuse, Charge, Indict, Arraign, Impeach. Of these words charge is the most general, and may be used in making any sort of imputation against a person, whether formally or informally, publicly or privately, and even in imputing special errors or defects to things. Thus Stillington speaks of persons 'charging the Scripture with obscurity and imperfection.' Accuse commonly, though not invariably, expresses something more formal than charge, and is seldom used of things. Indict is a purely legal term, meaning to make a written accusation against in legal form. Arraign is properly to bring to answer for wrong-doing before a court of justice; impeach, to bring to answer for wrong-doing before one or other of the branches of the legislature; and when either of these words is used in the general sense of to accuse, it is intended to convey the idea of peculiar dignity, impressiveness, or solemnity.

Ascervate (a-ser'vāt), a. In bot. heaped, or growing in heaps, or in closely-compacted clusters.

Ascivation (as'er-vā'shon), n. The act of heaping together. Johnson.

Acervose (a-ser'vōs), a. Full of heaps. Boyle.

Accescence (a-ser'sens), n. Accessency.

Accessency (a-ser'sen-si), n. The act or process of becoming ascendent; the process of becoming sour, tart, or acid; the state or quality of being moderately sour; sourness.

Wines should never give such after fasting; the milk having an accessency very prejudicial to the recipient. N. Jones.

Accescent (a-ser'sent), a. [L. accescent, turning sour, from acceso, incept. of acere, to be sour. See ACID.] Turning sour; becoming tart or acid by spontaneous decomposition, tion, as vegetable or animal juices or infusions. Hence, slightly sour; acidulous; subacid.

Acetabul (a-set-a-bl), n. An acetabulum; a measure of about one-eighth of a pint. Holland.

Acetabulifera (as-ē-tab'ū-lif'er-a), n. pl. [L. acetabulum, a sucker, and fero, to bear.] A section or order of cephalopodous molluscs, with rows of little cups or suckers on their arms or tentacles. Same as Dibranchiata.

Acetabuliferous (as-ē-tab'ū-lif'er-us), a. Pertaining to the Acetabulifera; having rows of cup-like suckers, like the cuttle-fish. Dana.

Acetabuliform (as-ē-ta-bū'li-form), a. In bot. cup-shaped. Gray.

Acetabulum (as-ē-ta-bū-lum), n. [L., from acetum, vinegar. See ACID.] 1. In Rom. antiq. a vessel in which sauce was served to table, and not unlike our vinegar cruets; also, a measure about one-eighth of a pint. 2. In compar. anat. (a) the cavity of a bone for receiving the protuberant end of another bone, the two together forming the articulation called anarthrosis; especially the cavity of the os innominatum, which receives the head of the thigh-bone. (b) A term applied to the cotyledons or lobes of the placenta of ruminating animals. (c) In insects, the socket of the trunk in which the leg is inserted. (d) The cup-like sucker with which the arms of the cuttle-fish and other molluscs are provided.—3. In bot. (a) the cup- or saucer-like fructification of many lichens. (b) The receptacle of certain fungi.—4. In music, a very ancient kind of kettle-drum.

Acetal (a-set'al), n. (C₂H₅O₂) A colourless, mobile liquid, with an agreeable odour, produced by the imperfect oxidation of alcohol, under the influence of platinum black. Slow combustion converts it into acetic acid.

Acetamide (a-set'a-mid), n. (NH₂C₂H₃O₂) A white crystalline solid, produced by distilling ammonium acetate, or by heating ethyl acetate with strong aqueous ammonia. It acts both as a base and an acid, combining on the one hand with hydrochloric acid, and on the other forming salts by the replacement of one of its hydrogen atoms by metals.

Acetarious (as-ē-tā'ri-us), a. A term applied to plants containing acetary; more appropriately to plants used in making salads; such as lettuce, mustard and cress, endive, &c.

Acetaria (as-ē-tā-ri), n. [L. acetaria, herbs eaten raw with vinegar and oil, from acetum, vinegar. See ACID.] An acid pulpy substance in certain fruits, as the pear.

Acetate (as-ē-tāt), n. A salt formed by the union of acetic acid with a base.

Acetated (as-ē-tāt-ed), a. Combined with acetic acid.

Acetic (a-set'ik), a. [L. acetum, vinegar.] Having the properties of vinegar; sour.—Acetic acid (C₂H₃O₂), an acid prepared by the oxidation of alcohol (acetous fermentation), the dry distillation of wood (in which case it is called pyroligneous acid), by decomposing an acetate, &c. It has a peculiar sharp smell and strong acid taste. It exists in vinegar in a dilute and impure form. In its pure state it is, at ordinary winter temperatures, a crystalline solid, and is known as glacial or crystalline acetic acid.—Acetic ethers, compounds consisting of acetates of alcohol radicals. Common acetic ether is a colourless, apple-flavoured, volatile fluid, and is a flavouring constituent in many wines. It is made artificially by distilling a mixture of alcohol, oil of vitriol, and acetate of potash.

Acetification (a-set'i-fi-kā'shon), n. The act of acetifying or making acetous or sour; the process of becoming acetous; the operation of making vinegar.—Chemical acetification, or the conversion of wine, beer, cider, and alcoholic fluids into acetic acid, is now supposed to be due to a minute mycoderma, a special vegetable organized being of the very simplest form, possessed of the power of almost inconceivably rapid development, as well as of fixing the oxygen of the air and transmitting it to the alcohol, thus establishing incomplete combustion.

Acetifier (a-set'i-fi-ēr), n. An apparatus for hastening the acidification of fermented liquors by exposing a large surface to the air, used in making vinegar.

Acetify (a-set'i-fi), v. t. pret. & pp. acetified; ppr. acetifying. [L. acetum, vinegar, and facio, to make.] To convert into acid or vinegar.

Acetify (a-set'i-fi), v. i. To become acid; to be converted into vinegar.

Acetimeter, Acetometer (as-ē-tim'et-ēr, as-ē-tom'et-ēr), n. [L. acetum, vinegar, and Gr. metron, measure.] An instrument for ascertaining the strength or purity of acids; an acidimeter.

Acetimetry (as-ē-tim'et-ri), n. The act or method of ascertaining the strength or purity of acids.

Acetone (as-ē-tōn), n. 1. A limpid mobile liquid (C₃H₆O), with an agreeable odour and a strong peppermint-like taste, produced by the destructive distillation of acetates.—2. The general name for a class of compounds which may be regarded as built up of an acid and alcoholic radical.

Acetopathy (as-ē-tōp'a-thi), n. [L. acetum, vinegar, and Gr. pathos, suffering.] A method of treating ailments by applying dilute acetic acid to the surface of the body above the spine and the parts affected.

Acetosity (as-ē-tōs'i-ti), n. The state or quality of being acetous or sour; sourness; tartness.

Acetous, Acetose (a-sē'tus, as-ē-tōs'), a. [L. acetum, vinegar.] 1. Having a sour taste; acid. 'An acetous spirit.' Boyle.—2. Causing or connected with acetification; as, acetous fermentation.—Acetous fermentation, the process by which alcoholic liquids, as beer or wine, yield acetic acid by oxidation. See under ACETIFICATION.—Acetous acid, a term formerly applied to impure and dilute acetic acid, under the notion that it was composed of carbon and hydrogen in the same proportions as in acetic acid, but with less oxygen. It is now known that no such acid exists, so that this term is not now in use.

Acetum (a-sē'tum), n. [L., from acere, to be sour. See ACID.] Vinegar (which see).

Acetyle (as-ē'til), n. (C₂H₃O), A hypothetical radical supposed to exist in acetic acid and its derivatives. Aldehyde may be regarded as the hydride, and acetic acid as the hydrate of acetylene.

Ach, Ache (āch), n. [Fr. ache, from L. apicium, parsley, from apis, a bee, bees being fond of parsley.] A kind of parsley. Holland.

Achean, Achalan (a-kē'an, a-kā'an), n. and a. See ACHEAN.

Achate (ā-kāt), n. An agate. 'The christall, jacinth, achate, ruby red.' John Taylor.

Achate, † n. [Fr. acheter, O. Fr. achater, achapter, to purchase, from L. accipere, to acquire, from L. ac for ad, to, and capere, to snatch at, to strive to get, intens. of capio, to take.] 1. Purchase; contract; bargain. Chaucer.—2. A thing purchased; specifically, in pl. provisions; in this sense written also Acates.

The kitchen clerke, that hight Digestion, Did order all th' achates in seemly wise. Spenser.

Achatina (a-kā-ti'nā), n. [L. achates, an agate.] A genus of pulmonate gastropodous Mollusca, family Helicidae, which feed on trees and shrubs in warm climates, such as Africa and the West Indies. Agate-snails is a name by which they are popularly known. Some of them have shells which are among the largest of land shells. Two small species, A. acicula and A. octina, are found in England.

Achatour, † n. [Norm. Fr., a purchaser. See ACHATE, CATERER.] A purchaser; a purveyor; a caterer. Written also Acater.

A gentill mancipie was ther of a temple, Of which achateurs mighten take exemple For to be wys in beyyng vitaille. Chaucer.

Ache (āk), n. [A. Sax. ace, ace, ees, ache, pain; acan, to ache; O.E. ake, ache, hache, ech; conjectured to be from natural cry expressive of pain or grief; comp. G. ach, pain; interj. ach! Dan. ak! Gr. achos, pain.] Pain, or continued pain, in opposition to sudden twinges, or spasmodic pain; a continued gnawing pain as in toothache or earache. Both verb and noun were formerly often pronounced, down at least to the time of Swift, with ch sounded as in church; though the old spelling ake sufficiently shows that the other pronunciation must also have been used. In the following couplet ache is made to rhyme with patch:—

Or Gellia wore a velvet mastic patch Upon her temples when no tooth did ache. Bp. Hall.

Thus pronounced, the plural of the noun and similar forms of the verb were dissyllabic.

A cooking shaver your shouting over the Old archer, shoot, your hollow shaft will pierce

This pronunciation was used, on the stage at least, even in the present century, being required by the metre in such passages as the following:

'Tis such that with old crumples,
Fill all thy lanes with arches, make thee rear the Arche (āk), n. [See the noun.] To suffer pain, to have or be in pain, or in continued pain, to be distressed. "The same enters at them." Shak. See under noun.

Achæan (a-kh'æn), a. Pertaining to Achæa in Greece, and a celebrated league or confederacy established there. This state lay on the Gulf of Corinth, within Peloponnesus. Written also Achæan, Achæan.

Achæan (a-kh'æn), a. A native or inhabitant of Achæa.

Achæan (ach'æn), a. Pertaining to Achæa in the island of Sumatra.

Achæan (ach'æn), a. sing and pl. A native or inhabitant of Achæa.

Achæan (a-kh'æn), a. (Gr a., priv., and arche the lip.) Without a lip, specifically, in bot a term denoting the absence of the labellum or lip in monstrous flowers of Orchidaceæ.

Achiever (a-chēv'ēr), n. One who achieves or accomplishes.

Achilles (a-kh'ē-lēs), n. (From a belief that Achilles used a plant of this genus to cure Telephus.) A genus of plants, the milfoil genus. See MILFOIL.

Achilles (a-kh'ē-lēs), n. A name (rendered familiar by Grote, the historian of Greece) given to those books (I. viii. and xi. xiii.) of the Iliad in which Achilles is prominent.

They are supposed to have formed a separate and original poem afterwards enlarged and expanded by additions, descriptive of various episodes in the Trojan war, in which other heroes than Achilles figure conspicuously.

The whole forming an epic of the Trojan war, and called the Iliad. These critics who recognize a personage Homer as the author of the Iliad and Odyssey suppose that the Achilles was an earlier effort, afterwards developed, or that he found the Achilles and made it the nucleus of a more extended epic.

Achilles (a-kh'ē-lēs), n. [L.] In anat the tendon of Achilles, the strong tendon of the gastrocnemius and soleus muscles which is inserted in the heel, so called because the heel was said to have been the only vulnerable part of the hero.

Achilles (a-kh'ē-lēs), n. [L.] Perhaps from L. achēnēs, name of an Indian plant. A genus of tropical and sub-tropical American plants, nat. order Gesneriaceæ, much cultivated in our hot-houses on account of their ornamental character. Many new forms, developing greater variety and attractive-ness than are to be found in the original kinds, have been obtained in the cultivated state. They grow to from 1 to 2 feet high.

Achilles (a-kh'ē-lēs), n. [L.] Enduring or coming pain, painful.

What peaceful heart I once enjoy'd,
How sweet their memory will
But they have left an ending void
The world can never fill.

Achilles (a-kh'ē-lēs), n. [L.] from achēnēs, the original Indian name of the tree. The arrow-tree, and the dye obtained from it. See ARROW.

Achira (a-chē'ra), n. A plant of the genus Canna (C. edulis), with a large succulent root, yielding rous les mous, a starch superior to the ordinary arrow root. Its tubers are eaten as food in Chili and Peru.

Achirite (a-kh'ē-rī-tē), n. [After Achir Maned, who first brought it from Siberia, and tried to dispose of it for emerald.] Emerald malachite.

Achiras (a-kh'ē-ras), n. [Gr a., priv., and chēnēs, a hand.] A genus of Sages, family Pterocætidæ (flat-leaves), distinguished from all the other genera by the total want of pectoral fins, hence their name. They abound mostly in the East and West Indies, keeping near the shores and furnishing a plentiful supply of wholesome food to the inhabitants. They resemble the common sole in appearance.

Achiridæ (a-kh'ē-rīd'ē), a. [Gr a., priv., and chēnēs, a hand.] In anat not penetrating a mantle, as, achiridæ Brachyopodæ.

Achiridæ (a-kh'ē-rīd'ē), a. [L.] A group of dicotyledonous plants which want both calyx and corolla, as the willows, oaks, and birches.

Achiridæ (a-kh'ē-rīd'ē), a. [Gr a., priv., and chēnēs, a mantle.] A term applied to plants which have neither calyx nor corolla, and whose flowers are consequently destitute of a covering, or naked, without floral envelope.

Achira (a-kh'ē-ra), n. [Gr achēnēs, gloom, obscurity from the doubt regarding their affinities.] A remarkable group of water plants referred by some botanists to the algae, but by others supposed to be aquatic forms of some fungi. They grow parasitically on dead fleshy lying in water, on fish, frogs, or decaying plants. They look like little gelatinous tufts, and are composed of colourless filaments.

Achirite (a-kh'ē-rī-tē), n. Same as Achirite.

Achir (a-kh'ēr), n. [Gr achēnēs, dandruff.] Scald head, a disease of infants, the face, and often the neck and breast, becoming incrustated with thin yellowish or greenish scales. It arises in minute whitish pustules which discharge a viscid fluid, which dries into a scab, and is believed to be due to the growth of a fungus.

Achirion (a-kh'ēr-i-on), n. [See ACHIR.] A name sometimes given to the fungus which produces the disease achir.

Achira (a-kh'ē-ra), n. [Gr achēnēs, the wild pear tree.] A genus of tropical trees, nat. order Sapotaceæ, with entire leathery leaves, and yielding a copious milky fluid when wounded. One species, A. sapota (called also Sapota Achira), is the sapotilla plum. See SAPOTILLA.

Achromatic (a-kh'ē-mat'ik), a. [Gr a., priv., and chrōma, chromatic, colour.] Devoid of colour, transmitting light without decomposing it into its primary colours; as, an achromatic lens or telescope. Achromatic lens, a lens usually composed of two separate lenses, a concave and a convex one, made from substances, as crown glass and flint glass, having different refractive and dispersive powers, with the curvatures so adjusted that the chromatic aberration produced by the one is corrected by the other, and light emerges from the compound lens undecomposed. Achromatic telescope, microscope, a telescope or microscope in which the chromatic aberration is corrected, usually by means of an achromatic objective glass.

Achromaticity (a-kh'ē-mat'ik-i-tē), n. State of being achromatic.

Achromatism (a-kh'ē-mat'ik-i-tē), n. The state of being achromatic, want of colour. See ACHROMATIC.

Achromatic (a-kh'ē-mat'ik), n. To deprive of colour.

Achromatopay (a-kh'ē-mat'ik-i-tē), n. [Gr a., priv., chrōma, colour, and opsis, sight.] Colour blindness, or inability to see or distinguish colours.

Achronia, Achronical (a-kh'ē-rō-nē-ik), a. See ACHRONIC.

Achroia (a-kh'ē-rō-ia), n. [L. achroia, a needle.] A name given by naturalists to a spiny or prickly of an animal or plant.

Achroia

sour taste. (Strong acids require large dilution with water to make this perceptible.) (3) Solubility in water. (4) The power of changing most organic blue and violet colours into red, and of restoring original colours altered by an alkali. (5) The power of decomposing most carbonates, causing effervescence. (6) The power of uniting in definite proportions with the metals, called bases, forming salts, the metal replacing the hydrogen of the acid. (7) The power of exchanging the whole or part of their hydrogen for an alkaline metal presented to them in the form of a hydrate. This last is the only essential property of acids.

Acidiferous (a-sid'i-fér-us), a. [E. acid, and L. ferre, to bear.] Bearing, producing, or containing acids, or an acid. — Acidiferous minerals, minerals which consist of an earth combined with an acid, as carbonate of lime, silicate, &c.

Acidifiable (a-sid'i-fé-a-bil), a. [From ACIDIFY.] Capable of being acidified or converted into an acid.

Acidification (a-sid'i-fé-á-shun), n. The act or process of acidifying or changing into an acid.

Acidifier (a-sid'i-fér), n. One who or that which acidifies; an acidifier; specifically, in chem. that which has the property of converting a substance into an acid.

Acidify (a-sid'i-fí), v. t. pret. & pp. acidified; ppr. acidifying. [E. acid, and L. facere, to make.] To make acid, to convert into an acid.

Acidimeter (a-sid'im-é-tér), n. [E. acid, and Gr. metron, measure.] An instrument for determining the purity or strength of acids, founded on the principle mentioned under ACIDIMETRY.

Acidimetry (a-sid'im-é-trí), n. The measurement of the strength of acids; especially the process of estimating the amount of acid in any liquid by finding how much of a standard alkaline solution is required to exactly neutralize a measured quantity of the given solution.

Acidity, Acidness (a-sid'i-tí, a-sid'-ness), n. The quality of being acid or sour, sourness, tartness, sharpness, to the taste.

Acidulate (a-sid'ú-lá-tí), v. t. pret. & pp. acidulated; ppr. acidulating. [Fr. aciduler, to make slightly sour; L. acidulus, slightly sour. See ACID.] To tincture with an acid, to make acid in a moderate degree. — Acidulated.

Acidulous (a-sid'ú-lus), a. [L. acidulus, slightly sour. See ACID.] Slightly sour; sub-acid, as cream of tartre, oranges, gooseberries, &c.

Aciform (a-sí-form), a. [L. acere, a needle, and forma, form.] Shaped like a needle.

Acinacous (a-sin-á-shus), a. [L. acinax, a grape-stone or kernel.] Full of kernels.

Acinacous (a-sin-á-shus), n. [L. from Gr. acinax, a Persian sword, Per acinax, a short sword — acinax, a sword, and ak, a diminutive termination.] A short, straight dagger worn on the right side, peculiar to the Scythians, Medes, and Persians.

Acinaciform (a-sin-á-sí-form), a. [L. acinax, a scimitar, Gr. acinax, and L. forma, form.] Formed like or resembling a scimitar, as an acinaciform leaf, that is, one which has one edge convex and sharp and the other straight and thick, as in Mosses-trachanthum.

Acinacous (a-sin-á-sí-us), n. A leaf covered with little spherical stalked vesicles resembling grape-seeds as in some algae.

Acinacous (a-sin-á-sí-us), n. A genus of noble epiphyllal orchids, from Central America, much prized in our hothouses.

Acinaciform (a-sin-á-sí-form), a. [L. acinax, a grape-stone, and forma, shape.] Having the form of grapes, or being in clusters like grapes, in anal. applied to many glands.

Acinacous, Acinacous (a-sin-á-shus, a-sin-á-us), a. [L. acinax, a grape-stone.] Consisting of minute granular concretions.

Acinus (a-sín-us), n. pl. Acini (a-sín-i). [L. a grape-stone.] 1. In anat. a name sometimes given to certain glands or glandular bodies, as the pancreas. 2. In bot. one of the small grains which make up some kinds of fruit, as the blackberry, raspberry, &c.; also, a grape-stone.

Acipenser (a-sí-pen-sér), a. [L.] A genus of cartilaginous ganoid fishes, family Acipenseridae or Sturionidae, distinguished by the bony scales or plates arranged at intervals along the body in five longitudinal rows. The gills are free as in osseous fishes, the snout long and conical, and the mouth retractile, toothless, and projecting from the under surface of the head. The genus includes the sturgeon, starlet, huso, &c. Acipenseridae (a-sí-pen-sér-i-dé), n. pl. The sturgeon family, otherwise called the Sturionidae.

Acquiesce (a-sí-á-í-sí), n. [Or acquiesce, a point or something sharp, and quies, operation.] Operative surgery [Rare.]

the second of the inferior orders of clergy, whose office it is to follow and serve the superior orders in the ministry of the altar, light the candles, prepare the elements of the sacraments, &c.—2. In aceton an attendant or accompanying star or other heavenly body, a satellite.
Acolyth, Acolyth (ak-o'-lith). See ACOLYTE.
Acolythist, Acolythist (a-kol'-thist, a-kol'-o'-thist), n. Same as Acolyte.
Acorn, v. s. t. To encumber; to clog; to overwhelm.

And hence his sheep encumbered in the mire.
Chaucer.

Acorydous, Acorydous (a-kor'-di-lus, a-kor'-di-lus), a. [Gr neg, prefix a, and koros, a joint.] In bot. jointless.

Aconite (ak-on'-it), n. [L. aconitum, Gr akoniton.] The plant wolf's-bane or monk's-hood, Aconitum Napellus. See ACONITUM.—Winter aconite (Frankia hibernica). See ERANTHUS.

Aconitic (ak-on'-it-ik), a. Of or pertaining to aconite.—Aconitic acid, a tribasic acid (C₆H₄O₆) obtained from species of the genus Aconitum. It occurs as an amorphous mass, and forms three classes of salts.
Aconitine, Aconitine (ak-on'-it-in), n. [See ACONITUM.] (C₃₄H₄₈N₂O₆). A highly poisonous narcotic alkaloid, got from the roots and leaves of several species of Aconitum. It forms white powdery grains, or a compact, vitreous, transparent mass, is bitter, acrid, and very soluble in alcohol. It is an important anodyne in neuralgia, and contracts the pupil of the eye. One-tenth of a grain is sufficient to kill a sparrow instantly.
Aconitum (ak-on'-it-um), n. [L. Gr akoniton, a poisonous plant, like monk's-hood.] A genus of poisonous plants, nat. order Ranunculaceae. The species are hardy, herbaceous plants, many of them of great beauty. The Bark or Bark of Nepal, used in poisoning arrows, &c., is derived from a plant of this genus, supposed to be a variety of A. Napellus. See WOLFE-BANE.

Aconitide (a-kon'-it-id), n. pl. A family of scurrian reptiles, of which the genus Aconitide is the type. It includes three genera. See ACONITUS.
Aconitias (a-kon'-it-as), n. [Gr akoniton, a dart, from akon, a dart.] 1. A genus of timid lacertian reptiles, group Scincoidae, which have rudiments only of the hind limbs, allied to the slow-worm of Britain. They occur in almost all regions, particularly the warm and dry. A. melleogaster is sometimes called dart-snake, from its manner of darting on its prey. This snake-like animal is about 5 feet in length, of a light gray colour, with black spots resembling eyes, the belly perfectly white. It is a native of Africa and the Mediterranean Isles.
2. In bot. a genus of Brazilian plants, nat. order Araceae, with spots on their stems like those of the reptiles so called.

Acopit (a-kop), adv. [Prefix a, on, and ape.] At the top. 'It stands acop.' R. Johnson.

Acopic (a-kop-ik), a. [Gr akopes, removing weariness, from negative prefix a, and hopes, a striking, hence suffering, toil, weariness, from hops, to strike.] In med. fitted to relieve weariness, restorative. Buchanan.

Acornaceae (a-kor'-i-sé-é), n. pl. Sweet-flag, a nat. order of herbaceous plants, of which the genus Acorta is the type. They are generally included in the Araceae, from which they differ only in having hermaphrodite flowers. See ACORTA, SWEET-RUSH.

Acorn (a-korn), n. [A. Sax. acorn, acorn, an acorn; Goth. akorn, fruit, Icel. akorn, Dan. akorn, D. akorn, L.G. akorn, O.H.G. akorn, an acorn, the word seems originally to have meant simply fruit, as in Gothic, though in early English it seems to have been regarded as a compound of oak, A. Sax. ak, and orn. It is probably allied to acore (which see).] 1. The fruit of the oak, a one-celled, one-seeded, oval nut, which grows in a permanent cup. In bygone times acorns were used as human food, and are still eaten in different parts of the Continent in scarce years. They form an excellent food for swine.

The first settlers of Boston were reduced to the necessity of feeding on acorns, mastnuts, ground-nuts, and acorns.

2. Acorn, a small ornamental piece of wood, of a conical or globular shape, sometimes fixed on the point of the spindle above the vane, on the mast-head, to keep the vane from being blown off.—3. See ACORN-SHELL.

Acorn-cup (a-korn'-kup), n. The capsule of the acorn. The acorn-cups of the Quercus Agilops, under the name velonia, have become an important article of commerce, large quantities being used in tanning. See VALONIA.

Acorned (a-korned), a. 1. Furnished or loaded with acorns; specifically, in her said of an oak represented on a coat of arms as loaded with acorns.—2. Fed with acorns.

Acorn-oil (a-korn'-oil), n. An oil expressed from acorns.

Acorn-shell (a-korn'-shell), n. 1. The shell of the acorn.—2. One of the cirripedes of the genus Balanus, allied to the barnacles, called by this name from a supposed resemblance of some of the species to acorns. See BALANUS, CIRRIPEDES.

Acorns (a-korn-s), n. [L. from Gr akornos, the sweet-flag.] A genus of plants, nat. order Araceae. A Coleus, the Coleus aromaticus of druggists, is the sweet-flag or sweet-rush. See SWEET-RUSH.

Acornia (a-korn'-i-a), n. [Gr. a, priv. and akornos, order or beauty.] Irregularity in disease, particularly in crises, also, ill-health, with loss of colour in the face. [Rare or obsolete.]

Acornism (a-korn'-izm), n. [Gr akornos, prefix a, and akornos, the world in a state of order.] The denial of the existence of an eternal world. Dean Mansel.

Acornist (a-korn'-ist), n. One who holds the doctrine of acornism.

Acornistic (a-korn'-ist-ik), a. Pertaining to the doctrine of acornism.

Acornium (a-korn'-i-um), n. A group of Brazilian plants belonging to the nat. order Leguminosae, now included in the genus Breutia.

Acotyledon (a-kot-il'-é-don), n. [Or a, priv. and rotyledon, any cup-shaped cavity, from rotyle, a hollow.] In bot. a plant whose seeds, called spores, are not furnished with Acotyledon.

1. Spores of Lichens, germinating; 2. Spores of horsetails (Equisetaceae), germinating; 3. Spores of mosses, germinating.

acotyledons or seed-lobes. In the natural system of Jussieu the Acotyledones form a class which corresponds with the Cryptogamia of Linnaeus. See COTYLEDON.

Acotyledonous (a-kot-il'-é-don-us), a. Having no seed-lobes.

Acouchy (a-kouch'), n. [Fr. acouchi, acouchi, name in Guiana.] An animal belonging to the Cavida or guinea-pig family, the olive cavy or Surinam rat, a small species of Agouti inhabiting Guiana.

Acousteter (a-koun'-et-er), n. [Gr. akouo, to hear, and metron, measure.] An instrument for measuring the acuteness of the sense of hearing.

Acoustic (a-kous-istik), n. See ACOUSTIC.

Acoustic (a-kous-istik), n. [Gr akouesthai, from akouo, to hear.] Pertaining to the sense or organs of hearing, or to the doctrine of sounds.—Acoustic duct, in anat. the meatus auditorius, or external passage of the ear. See AUDITORY.—Acoustic scale, in the anc. drama, brazen tubes or vessels, shaped like a bell, used to propel the voice of the actors, so as to render them audible to a great distance, in some theatres 400 feet.

Acoustic (a-kous-istik), n. 1. Is used a remedy for deafness or imperfect hearing. [Rare.] 2. A name given to such of the disciples of Pythagoras as had not completed their five years' probation. Called also Acoustemists.
Acoustical (a-kous-istik-al), a. Of or belonging to the science of acoustics, acoustic.

This principle, which is important in many acoustical problems, is, in the one case before us, unimportant.

Acoustician (a-kous-istik-an), n. One skilled in the science of sound; a student of acoustics.

The transverse vibrations were the only ones noticed by the earlier acousticians.

Acoustics (a-kous-istik), n. [See ACOUSTIC, a.] The science of sound, teaching the causes, nature, and phenomena of the vibrations of elastic bodies which affect the organ of hearing. The manner in which sound is produced, its transmission through air and other media (sometimes called dissonances), the doctrine of reflected sound, or echos (sometimes called catoptrics), the properties and effects of different sounds, including musical sounds or notes, the structure and action of the organ of hearing, are all treated of under acoustics.

Acquaint (ak-want'), v. [O Fr. acquiescer; Fr. acquiescer; L.L. acquiescere, to make known, from L. ad, to, and quiescere, known, from quiescere, quiescere, to know, same root as in know, can, ken, quiescere, quiescere, &c.] 1. To make known, to make fully or intimately known, to make familiar, as, to acquaint one's self with a subject; time and circumstances may acquaint a man with many a strange experience.

A man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief.
Isa. liii. 3.

2. To inform; to communicate notice to; as, a friend in the country acquaints me with his success; with is used before the subject of information, if a noun, or was formerly used, but is now obsolete or considered improper.

But for some other reason, my grave sir,
 Which is not yet known, I not acquiesce
 My father of this business.
Shaks.

Acquaint (ak-want'), v. To inform, apprise, disclose, communicate, make known.

Acquaintable (ak-want'-i-ble), a. Easy to be acquainted with, affable. [Rare.]

Acquaintance (ak-want'-ans), n. 1. A state of being acquainted, or of having more or less intimate knowledge used with reference both to persons and things.

If there be no great love in the beginning, yet heaven may decrease it upon better acquaintance, when we are married.
Shaks.

Such knowledge, however, and sense of judgment as springs from special skill, and from a familiar acquaintance with the mechanical processes of certain arts, trades, and manufactures, will often be found in this class.
Sir G. C. Lewis

2. A person known to one, especially a person with whom one is not on terms of great intimacy, as, he is not a friend, only an acquaintance.

We see he is ashamed of his nearest acquaintances.
Byron.

3. The whole body of those with whom one is acquainted in this sense without a plural, the word being plural in meaning. [Todd suggests that acquaintance in this use is calchastic for acquaintances, on type of acquaintances.]

Many acquaintances are rarely estranged from me.
Job xii. 13.

—To cultivate one's acquaintance, to endeavour to become intimate with a person.

Acrid (ak'rid), a. [L. acer, acris, acre, sharp; Fr. acré; root ac. (See ACID). The termination in this word may have arisen from a spurious form acridus perhaps used in modern scientific Latin.] 1. Sharp or biting to the taste; pungent; bitter; as, acrid salts.—2. Severe; virulent; violent; stinging. 'Acrid temper.' Cowper.—Acrid substances are those which excite in the organs of taste a sensation of pungency and heat, and when applied to the skin irritate and inflame it.—Acrid poisons, including those also called corrosive and escharotic, are those which irritate, corrode, or burn the parts to which they are applied, producing intense burning sensation, and acute pain in the alimentary canal. They include concentrated acids and alkalies, compounds of mercury, arsenic, copper, &c.

Acrid (ak'rid), n. An acrid poison. 'A powerful acrid.' Perreira.

Acridia, Acridii (a-krid'i-a, a-krid'i-l), n. pl. See ACRIDIDÆ.

Acridian (a-krid'i-an), n. One of the Acrididæ.

Acrididæ (a-krid'i-dé), n. A family of orthopterous insects containing the grasshoppers. All the species of this family can leap. Acridity (a-krid'i-ti), n. Same as Acridness. Acridness (ak'rid-nés), n. The quality of being acrid or pungent.

Acrimonious (ak-ri-mō'n-i-us), a. 1. Abounding in acrimony or acridness; acrid; bitter; corrosive. 'If gall cannot be rendered acrimonious and bitter of itself.' Harvey.—2. Fig. severe; bitter; virulent; caustic; stinging; applied to language, temper, and the like. 'Acrimonious contempt.' Johnson. 'An acrimonious conflict.' Macaulay. [The latter is now the commoner sense.]

Acrimoniously (ak-ri-mō'n-i-us-l), adv. In an acrimonious manner; sharply; bitterly; pungently.

Acrimoniousness (ak-ri-mō'n-i-us-nés), n. The state or quality of being acrimonious.

Acrimony (ak'ri-mo-ni), n. [L. acrimonia, sharpness, from acris, sharp (see ACID), and affix monia.] 1. A quality of bodies which corrodes, dissolves, or destroys others; also, harshness or extreme bitterness of taste; pungency.

Those milks (in certain plants) have all an acrimony, though one would think they should be lenitive. Bacon.

2. Fig. sharpness or severity of temper; bitterness of expression proceeding from anger, ill-nature, or petulance; pungency; virulence. 'Acrimony and indignation.' South. 'Acrimony of voice and gesture.' Bp. Hackett.

—Acrimony, Asperity, Harshness, Tartness. Acrimony expresses a high degree of bitterness of language proceeding from a soured or malignant temper; asperity refers rather to the manner than the disposition, and does not necessarily imply any malignity of temper, but may be due to a feeling of just indignation; harshness generally implies an undue measure of asperity; tartness expresses a comparatively slight degree of bitterness, and usually implies also a certain amount of wit.

No order of men have an enmity of more acrimony. Johnson.

The orators of the opposition declared against him with great animation and acrimony. Macaulay.

My useful seeming harshness, pardon it. Tennyson.

The popular harangue, the hart reply. Cowper.

Acrisia (a-kris'i-a), n. [Gr. neg. prefix a-, and krisia, judgment.] A condition of disease in which no judgment can be formed, or in which an unfavourable judgment must be given. Dunglison.

Acristy (ak'ri-si), n. [See ACRISIA.] [Rare.]

1. Same as Acristia.—2. Injudiciousness.

Acrita (ak'ri-ta), n. pl. [Gr. akritos, indiscernible.] A name of the lower Radiata, now called rotatoria, having no distinct discernible nervous system, as sponges.

Acritan, Acrite (ak'ri-tan, ak'rit), n. One of the Acrita.

Acritical (a-krit'ik-al), a. In med. (a) having no crisis; as, an acritical abscess. (b) Giving no indications of a crisis; as, acritical symptoms.

Acritude (ak'ri-tūd), n. [See ACRID.] An acrid quality; bitterness to the taste; biting heat. [Rare.]

Acrity (ak'ri-ti), n. [L. acritas, sharpness. See ACRID, &c.] Sharpness; keen severity; strictness. 'The acrity of prudence, and severity of judgment.' Bacon.

Acroasmatic, Acroasmatical (ak-rō-a-mat'ik, ak-rō-a-mat'ik-al), a. [Gr. akroasmatikos, from akroasmai, to hear.] Abstruse; pertaining to deep learning, and opposed to exoteric. Aristotle's lectures were of two kinds: acroatic, acroasmatic, or esoteric, which were intended for hearing only and were not committed to writing, and were delivered to a class of select disciples, who had been previously instructed in the elements of learning; and exoteric, which were delivered in public. The former respected being, God, and nature; the principal subjects of the latter were logic, rhetoric, and policy.

We read no acroasmatic lectures. Hales. Aristotle was wont to divide his lectures and readings into acroasmatic and exoteric. Hales.

Acroasmatics (ak-rō-a-mat'iks), n. pl. Aristotle's lectures on the more subtle parts of philosophy. See ACROSMATIC.

Acroatic (ak-rō-at'ik), a. [Gr. akroatikos, pertaining to hearing, from akroasmai, to hear.] Abstruse. Same as Acroasmatic (which see).

Acroatics (ak-rō-at'iks), n. pl. Same as Acroasmatics.

Acrobat (ak-rō-bat), n. [Gr. akrobates, to go on tip-toe, to climb upwards—akros, high, on the tip of anything, and bainō, to go.] A rope-dancer; also, one who practises high vaulting, or similar feats of personal agility, as tumbling, throwing somersaults, &c.

Acrobates (a-krob-at-éz), n. [Gr. akros, high, and bainō, to go.] A sub-genus of Petaurus, a genus of marsupial animals, family Phalangistidæ, indigenous to Australia, containing the opossum mouse (A. pygmaeus), one of the smallest of the Marsupialia. It is hardly larger than a mouse, and has a parachute.

Acrocarpi (ak-rō-karp'i), n. pl. [Gr. akros, highest, and karpos, fruit.] In bot. a division of the mosses containing the species in which the capsule terminates the growth of a primary axis.

Acrocarpus (ak-rō-karp'us), a. In bot. applied to mosses whose flower terminates the growth of a primary axis; of or pertaining to the Acrocarpi.

The flower of mosses either terminates the growth of a primary axis (acrocarpus), or the flower is placed at the end of an axis of the second or third order (pleurocarpus). Sachs.

Acrocephalic (ak-rō-sé-fal'ik), a. [Gr. akros, highest, and kephale, the head.] In ethn. a term applied to the pyramidal or high-skulled tribes of men, or to their skulls.

Acrocerasium (ak-rō-sé-ra'si-an), a. [Gr. akron, a summit, and keraunos, thunder.] An epithet applied to certain mountains in the north of Epirus in Greece. They project into the Adriatic, and were so termed from being often struck with lightning. Written also Akrokerasian.

The thunder-hills of fear. Byron.

The acrocerasian mountains of old name. Byron.

Acrochordon (ak-rō-kord'on), n. [Gr., from akros, high, extreme, and chordē, a string.] An excrescence on the skin, with a slender base.

Acrocinus (ak-rō-si'nus), n. [Gr. akron, point, kineō, I move.] A genus of longicorn coleopterous insects, family Cerambycidæ, so called from having the spine on each side of the thorax movable. A. longimanus, the harlequin beetle of South America, is the type. It is 2½ inches long, with antennæ 5, and fore-legs alone 4 inches in length.

Acrocomia (ak-rō-kō-mi-a), n. [Gr. akros, extreme, and komē, a tuft.] A genus of tropical American plants, nat. order Palmales, allied to the coccoloba. The species include some of the most majestic palms, 30 or 40 feet high, and crowned with a tuft of gigantic leaves. A. aculeata has a stem as thick as a man's body, and yields a small round fruit, with a thin, sweetish, astringent pulp, and a nut with a white edible kernel. See MACAW-TREE.

Acrodactylum (ak-rō-dak'til-um), n. [Gr. akros, high, uppermost, and daktylos, a digit.] The upper surface of each digit in a bird.

Acrodont (ak-rō-dont), n. [Gr. akros, high, on the top, and odontos, a tooth.] A term common to those lacertian reptiles which have their teeth united at the top of the alveolar ridge.

Acrodont (ak-rō-dont), a. Pertaining to or resembling the acrodonts; characterized by an arrangement of the teeth like that of the acrodonts.

Acrodus (ak-rō-dus), n. [See ACRODONT.] A genus of placoid fossil fishes, vulgarly styled fossil leeches, with large enamelled striated teeth. The teeth especially are common in the chalk and oolite.

Acrogen (ak-rō-jen), n. [Gr. akros, high, on the top, and gennao, to produce.] An acrogenous plant. In bot. the acrogens form a division of the Cryptogamia, distinguished by the habits of growth and the mode of impregnation from the Thallogens. They have true stems with leafy appendages (excepting the Riccias and Marchantias), and the embryonic sac is impregnated by the spermatozooids. They are divided into two groups:—(a) Those composed wholly of cellular tissue, the charas, liverworts, and mosses; and (b) Those in which vascular tissue is present, the ferns, horsetails, pill-worts, and club-mosses.—The age of acrogens, in geol. the carboniferous era, when acrogens were the characteristic vegetable forms.

Acrogenous (a-krog'en-us), a. Increasing by growth at the summit, as the tree-ferns; pertaining to the acrogens.

Acrognathus (a-krog-na-thus), n. [Gr. akros, high, and gnathos, the jaw.] A genus of fossil fishes of the salmon family, occurring in the lower chalk.

Acrography (a-krog'ra-fi), n. [Gr. akros, high, and graphō, to write or engrave.] The art of producing designs in relief on metal or stone by etching, for the purpose of printing from them along with type, and thus superseding wood-engraving.

Acroke, a. Crooked; awkward. 'The matter is acroke.' Chaucer. Written also A-crooke.

Acrolein, Acroleine (a-krō-lē-in), n. [Gr. akros, high, on the top, and L. oleum, oil.] (C₂H₃O.) A colourless limpid liquid obtained by distilling glycerine with acid potassium sulphate. This substance is produced by the destructive distillation of fatty bodies, such as an ordinary candle; it has a most intensely irritating odour. Acrolein is the aldehyde of the allyl series. See ALLYL.

Acrolith (ak-rō-lith), n. [Gr. akros, high, extreme, and lithos, a stone.] In arch. and sculp. a statue, of which only the extremities are stone.

Acrolithan (a-krō-lith-an), a. Pertaining to an acrolith; formed like an acrolith; as, an acrolithan statue.

Acromial (a-krō-mi-al), a. In anat. relating to the acromion.

Acromion (a-krō-mi-on), n. [Gr. akros, high, extreme, and omos, shoulder.] In anat. that process of the spine of the scapula which receives the extreme part of the clavicle, and gives attachment to part of the deltoid and trapezius muscles.

Acromonogrammatic (a-krom'o-nō-gram-mat'ik), n. and a. [Gr. akros, extreme, monos, alone, and gramma, a letter.] A term applied to a poetical composition in which every verse begins with the same letter as that with which the preceding verse ends.

Acro-narcotics (ak-rō-nark-ot'iks), n. pl. [Gr. akros, extreme, and E. narcotics.] A division of poisons, chiefly of vegetable origin, which irritate and inflame the alimentary canal, and act on the brain and spinal cord, producing stupor, coma, paralysis, and convulsions. Called also Narcotico-acrida or Narcotico-irritantia.

Acronyc, Acronycal (a-kron'ik, a-kron'ik-al), a. [Gr. akros, extreme, and nux, night.] In astron. culminating at midnight: said of a star which rises as the sun sets, and sets as the sun rises, and is, therefore, directly opposite the sun; opposed to comical. Spelled also, though improperly, Acronic, Acronical.

Acronycally (a-kron'ik-al-li), adv. In an acronycal manner; so as to culminate at midnight. A star is said to rise and set acronycally when it rises as the sun sets, and sets as the sun rises.

Acropetal (ak-rō-pet-al), a. [Gr. akros, top, and petalon, a leaf.] In bot. having an origin successively nearer the top of the axis, as leaves.

Acropodium (ak-rō-pō'di-um), n. [Gr. akros, the top, and pous, foot.] In zool. the upper surface of the whole foot.

Acropolis (a-krop'o-lis), n. [Gr. akros, high, and polis, a city.] The citadel of a Grecian city, usually situated on an eminence commanding the town, and strong by nature or art; that of Athens contained some of the finest buildings of the city, such as the Parthenon and Erechtheum.

Acrotaurus (ak'rō-sa-rus), n. [Gr. akros, extreme, and taurus, a lizard.] An extraordinary fossil reptile, with thirty or forty teeth, and a broad cheek-bone process, occurring in the trias sandstones of South Africa.

Acrospire (ak'rō-spir), n. [Gr. akros, highest, and spira, a spire, or spiral line.] The first leaf which rises above the ground when corn germinates; also the rudimentary stem or first leaf which appears in malted grain; the developed plumule of the seed.

Acrospired (ak'rō-spir), a. Having or exhibiting the acrospire; especially, in malt-making, a term applied to the grains of barley which have sprouted so far as to exhibit the blade or plumule end, the root or radicle also appearing.

Acrosporous (a-kro'spōr-us), a. [Gr. akros, a summit, and sporos, seed.] A term applicable of one of the two modes in which fruit is formed in fungi. In this method the spores are naked and produced at the tips of cells. For the other method see ASCIGEROUS.

Across (a-kro's), prep. [Prefix a, and cross.] 1. From side to side: opposed to along, which is in the direction of the length; ashwart; quite over; as, a bridge is laid across a river. — 2. Intersecting; passing over at any angle; as, a line passing across another.

Across (a-kro's), adv. 1. From one side to another; crosswise.

With arms across.

He stood, reflecting on his country's loss. Dryden.

2. Adversely; contrarily. 'Things go across.' Mir. for Mags. — 3. † Used as a kind of exclamation when a Sally of wit miscarried, in allusion to failure when jousting, as at the quintain. 'Good faith, across!' Shak. — To break across, in tilting, to allow one's spear by awkwardness to be broken across by the body of the adversary, instead of by the push of the point.

One said he broke across. Sir P. Sidney.

Acrostic (a-kro'stik), n. [Gr. akrostickhion, an acrostic — akros, extreme, and stichos, order or verse.] 1. A composition in verse, in which the first, or the first and last, or certain other letters of the lines, taken in order, form a name, title, motto, &c., which is the subject of the poem. 'Anagrams, chronograms, acrostics.' Burton. — 2. A Hebrew poem of which the initial letters of the lines, or stanzas, were made to run over the letters of the alphabet in their order. Twelve of the psalms are of this character, of which Psalm cxix. is the best example.

Acrostatic (a-kro'stik), a. That relates to or contains an acrostic; as, acrostatic verses.

Acrostatically (a-kro'stik-al-li), adv. In the manner of an acrostic.

Acrotarsium (ak-rō-tār'al-um), n. [Gr. akros, highest, and tarsos, tarsus, sole of the foot.] In anat. the upper surface of the tarsus. See TARSUS.

Acrotelæatic (ak'rō-tel-f'atik), a. [Gr. akros, extreme, and telæatik, end.] Eccles, an appellation given to anything added to the end of a psalm or hymn, as a doxology.

Acroter (ak'rō-tēr), n. Same as Acroterium.

Acroterial (ak-rō-tēr-i-al), a. Pertaining to the acroterium; as, acroterial ornaments.

Acroterium (ak-rō-tēr-i-um), n. pl. ACRO- an ornament, the apex or angles of a pediment. The term is generally restricted to the small pedestals placed on the apex and angles of a pediment for the support of statues or other ornaments. It is also used to denote the pinnacles or other ornaments on the horizontal copings or parapets of buildings, and which are sometimes called acroterial ornaments. — 2. In anat. an extremity of the human body, as a hand, a foot, &c.

Acrothalligine (ak-rō-thal'i-j'i-nē), n. pl. [Gr. akros, extreme, and thymos, thyme.] In med. a rugose wart, with a narrow base and broad top, compared by Celsus to the flower of thyme. Called also Thymus.

Acrotic (a-krot'ik), a. [L. acroticus, from Gr. akros, extreme, and thymos, thyme.] Belonging to or affecting external surfaces; as, acrotic diseases.

Acrotomous (a-krot'ō-mus), a. [Gr. akros, extreme, and tomos, a cutting.] In mineral, having a cleavage parallel to the top or base.

Acrylic (a-kri'lik), a. Of or pertaining to acrolein. — Acrylic acid (C₂H₃O₂), an agreeably smelling liquid, produced by the oxidation of acrolein. This acid is monobasic, and its salts are very soluble in water.

Act (akt), v.t. [L. ago, actum, to exert power, to put in motion, to do; Gr. agō, to lead; allied to loel, akta, to drive, and probably to E. acre (which see).] 1. To exert power; to produce effects; as, the stomach acts upon food; the will acts upon the body in producing motion.

How body acts upon the impassive mind. Garth.

2. To be in action or motion; to carry into effect a purpose or determination of the mind.

He hangs between in doubt to act or rest. Pope.

3. To behave, demean, or conduct one's self, as in morals, private duties, or public offices.

He most lives

Who thinks most, feels the noblest, acts the best. P. J. Bailey.

4. To perform, as an actor; to represent a character; to feign; as, he acts very well; he is only acting. — To act up to, to equal in action; to perform an action or series of actions correspondent to; to fulfil; as, he has acted up to his engagement or his advantages.

Act (akt), v.t. 1. To transact; to do or perform.

Thou wast a spirit too delicate

To act her earthy and abhor'd commands. Shak.

Industry doth beget ease by procuring good habits and facility of acting things expedient for us to do. Barrow.

2. To represent as real; to perform on or as on the stage; to play; hence, to feign or counterfeit; as, to act Macbeth; to act the same part nightly. 'With acted fear the villain thus pursued.' Dryden. — 3. To perform the office of; to assume the character of; as, to act the hero. — 4. † To put in action; to actuate.

Most people in the world are acted by levity and humour. South.

Self-love, the spring of motion, acts the soul. Pope.

Act (akt), n. 1. That which is being done or which has been done; the exertion of power; the effect of which power exerted is the cause; as, the act of giving or receiving; a deed. In this sense it denotes an operation of the mind as well as of the body.

Illustrious acts high raptures do infuse. Waller.

— In the act, in the actual performance or commission; said especially of persons who are caught when engaged in some misdeed.

This woman was taken in the very act. Jn. viii. 4.

— In act to, prepared or ready to; on the very point; implying a certain bodily disposition or posture; as, in act to strike.

Gathering his flowing robe, he seemed to stand

In act to speak, and graceful stretched his hand. Pope.

2. A state of reality or real existence, as opposed to a possibility; actuality.

The seeds of plants are not at first in act, but in possibility, what they afterwards grow to be. Hobbes.

3. A part or division of a play performed without interruption, in which a definite and coherent portion of the plot is represented; generally subdivided into smaller portions, called scenes. — 4. The result of public deliberation, or the decision of a prince, legislative body, council, court of justice, or magistrate; a decree, edict, law, statute, judgment, resolve, award, determination; as, an act of parliament; an act of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland. — 5. In English universities, a thesis maintained in public by a candidate for a degree, or to show the proficiency of a student. At Oxford, the occasion when masters and doctors complete their degrees is also called the act. — 6. In law, an instrument or deed in writing, serving to prove the truth of some bargain or transaction; as, I deliver this as my act and deed. — Act of bankruptcy. See under BANKRUPTCY. — Act of faith, auto de fé (which see). — Act of God, in law, an accident or event which takes place without human intervention, and is beyond man's control, as the consequences arising from storms, lightning, &c., and which no party is bound to make good to another, independently of special contract. — Act of grace, a term sometimes applied to general pardons at the beginning of a new reign, &c. — Act of indemnity. See INDEMNITY. — Act of Parliament. See PARLIAMENT. — Act of sedition, an ordinance of the Court of Session under authority of an act of the Scottish Parliament passed in 1540, by which the judges are empowered to make such statutes as may be necessary for expediting justice. — Action, Act. See ACTION.

Acta (ak'ta), n. pl. [L.] 1. Acta. — 2. Specifically, proceedings in a legal or ecclesiastical court. — Acta Sanctorum, the Acts of the Saints, the name sometimes applied to all collections of accounts of ancient saints and martyrs, both of the Roman and Greek Churches, but specifically the name of a work begun by the Bollandists, a society of Jesuits, in 1643, and not yet completed, portions of it still appearing at intervals, it being carried on in the order of the calendar.

Actæa (ak-tē'a), n. [L. actæa, herb-christopher, Gr. aktē, aktia, the elder, from the leaves resembling those of the elder.] A genus of plants, nat. order Ranunculaceæ, found in Europe, the north of Asia, and America. The species are possessed of nauseous and deleterious properties. Two American species are considered to be a remedy for the bite of the rattlesnake; hence called rattle-snake herbs. A. epicata is called in England herb-christopher and bans-berry.

Actian (ak'hī-an), a. Relating to Actium, a town and promontory of Epirus; as, Actian games, which were instituted by Augustus to celebrate his naval victory over Anthony, near that town, Sept. 2, B.C. 31. They were celebrated every five years. Hence, Actian years, reckoned from that era.

Actinenchyma (ak-tin-en'ki-ma), n. [Gr. aktis, aktinos, a ray, and enchyma, infusion.] The radiated cellular tissue of some medullas; stellate cellular tissue.

Acting (ak'ting), p. and a. Performing duty, service, or functions; often applied to one who does the real work of an office for a nominal or honorary holder of the post; one who does interim duty for a superior in the case of the latter's absence or decease.

The day after Captain Kearney's decease, his acting successor made his appearance aboard.

Murray.

Actinia (ak-tin'i-a), n. A genus of zoophytes, belonging to the Radiata of Cuvier, regarded as the type of the class Actinozoa, sub-kingdom Coelenterata, in modern classification. The body is cylindrical, and is attached by one extremity, the mouth occupying the middle of the upper or free extremity. Tentacles, disposed in concentric whorls, surround the mouth, which, when spread, resemble the petals of a flower; whence the popular name animal-flowers, sea-anemones (which see). They are not perfectly radial in symmetry, the common polyp of the seashore (A. mesembryanthemum) having the oral aperture slightly elliptical, the long axis being marked by a tubercle at either end; the animal thus presents a faint but well-marked indication of bilateral symmetry. They move by alternately contracting and expanding their base, and by their tentacles. The species are often of brilliant colours, and many of them are eaten. See ACTINOZOA.

Actiniads (ak-tin'i-a-dē), n. pl. A family of Coelenterata, belonging to the order Heliteris (ak-rō-tēr-i-a). [Gr. akroterion, a summit, apex, from akros, highest.] 1. In arch.

ch, chain; ch, Sc. loch; g, go; j, job;

h, Fr. ton; ng, sing; TH, then; th, thin;

w, wig; wh, whig; zh, azure. — See KRY.

anthoids, of which the genus Actinia is the type. See ACTINIA.

Actinic (ak-tin'ik), a. 1. Pertaining to actinism; specifically, pertaining to the chemical rays of the sun. — 2. In photog. applied to a compound lens when the real image which it gives upon the screen is such that a large number of those coloured rays which exert chemical action upon the substances composing the sensitive tablet are combined with sufficient of the luminous rays to render the image visible. See ACTINISM.

Actiniform (ak-tin'i-form), a. [Gr. aktis, aktinos, a ray, and L. forma, form.] Having a radiated form.

Actinism (ak-tin-izm), n. [Gr. aktis, aktinos, a ray.] 1. The radiation of heat or light; or that branch of natural philosophy which treats of the radiation of heat or light. — 2. The property of the chemical part of the sun's rays, which, as seen in photography, produces chemical combinations and decompositions. A ray, when decomposed by refraction through a prism, is found to possess three properties, viz. the luminous, the heating, and the chemical or actinic, the two latter acting at opposite ends of the spectrum. The actinic property or force, or actinism, begins among the violet rays, and extends a long way beyond the visible spectrum.

Actinocarpus (ak-tin-ō-kar'pus), n. [Gr. aktis, aktinos, a ray, and karpōs, fruit.] A genus of plants, nat. order Alliaceae; starfruit. A. Damasium is a British plant, growing in ditches and pools, mostly in a gravelly soil.

Actino-chemistry (ak-tin-ō-kem'is-tri), n. Chemistry in its relation to actinism. See ACTINISM.

Actinograph (ak-tin'ō-graf), n. [Gr. aktis, aktinos, a ray, and graphō, to write.] An instrument for measuring and registering the variations of actinic or chemical influence in the solar rays, the intensity of which bears no direct relation to the quantity of light, but varies at different periods of the day and of the year. There are several forms of this instrument, all of them depending on the same principle, namely, the depth of the blackening effect of the chemical rays allowed to fall on a sensitive piece of paper for a given time.

Actinoid (ak-tin-oid), a. [Gr. aktis, aktinos, a ray, and eidōs, likeness.] Resembling a ray or rays; radiated.

Actinoida (ak-tin-oid-a), n. pl. A class of marine Radiata; the same with Actinozoa (which see).

Actinolite (ak-tin'ō-lit), n. [Gr. aktis, aktinos, a ray, and lithos, a stone.] A mineral, called by Werner strahlstein (ray-stone), nearly allied to hornblende, and consisting chiefly of silica, calcium, magnesium, and iron. — Actinolite schist, a metamorphic rock consisting principally of actinolite, with an admixture of mica, quartz, or feldspar; its texture is slaty and foliated.

Actinolithic (ak-tin'ō-lit'ik), a. Like or pertaining to actinolite.

Actinometer (ak-tin-om'et-er), n. [Gr. aktis, aktinos, a ray, and metron, measure.] An instrument for measuring the intensity of the sun's actinic rays. Several of these instruments have been invented based upon the production of certain chemical reactions by means of the chemical rays.

Actinometric (ak-tin'ō-met'rik), a. Of or belonging to the actinometer, or the measurement of the chemical action of the sun's rays.

Actinosoma (ak-tin'ō-sō'ma), n. [Gr. aktis, aktinos, a ray, and sōma, body.] A term employed to designate the entire body of any actinozoön, whether this be simple (as in the sea-anemones) or composed of several zooids (as in most corals).

Actinote (ak-tin-ōt), n. [Gr. aktis, aktinos, a ray.] A radiated mineral, consisting of silicate of calcium and magnesium.

Actinozoa (ak-tin'ō-zō'a), n. pl. [Gr. aktis, aktinos, a ray, and zōon, an animal.] A class of radiated, soft marine zoophytes, embracing the sea-anemones, corals, sea-pens, &c., in which the stomach acts also as a lung, and is separated from the mouth by a space divided into chambers by partitions bearing the reproductive organs. Some are compound, living on a polypoid, some adhere to rocks, &c., and some are free. All have beautifully rayed tentacula arranged around the mouth, which, when displayed, present in some genera, as Actinia, no remote resemblance to some of our finest composite flowers.

They are reproduced by germs thrown out at the mouth, by gemmules or buds developed on the base of their disk, and by division, each separated part becoming a complete animal. They present that strange generative phenomenon known as metagenesis or alternation of generation. They, with the Hydrozoa, constitute the sub-kingdom Cœlenterata.

Actinozoön (ak-tin'ō-zō'on), n. [See ACTINOZOÆ.] An individual member of the Actinozoa, whether simple or compound.

Action (ak'shon), n. [L. actio. See ACT.] 1. The state or manner of acting or being active, as opposed to rest; activity; active exertion; energy manifested in outward acts; bustle or traffic of life; as, a man of action. 'A life of civic action.' Tennyson.

It is necessary to that perfection of which our present state is capable that the mind and body should both be kept in action. Johnson.

I myself must mix with action lest I wither by despair. Tennyson.

2. An act or thing done; a deed; an exploit; a feat; specifically, in ethics, any result of activity regarded as proceeding from a moral agent.

The Lord is a God of knowledge, and by him actions are weighed. 1 Sam. ii. 3.

3. The exertion of power or force by one thing on another; agency; operation; impulse; as, the action of wind upon a ship's sails. — 4. In poetry and the drama, the connected series of events on which the interest of the piece depends; the main subject or fable as distinguished from an incidental action or episode. The unity of action is regarded as one of the dramatic unities.

This action should have three qualifications: first, it should be one action; secondly, it should be an entire action; and thirdly, it should be a great action. Adams.

5. In rhet. gesture or postulation; the external deportment of the speaker, or the accommodation of his attitude, voice, gestures, and countenance to the subject, or to the thoughts and feelings of the mind.

Suit the action to the word, the word to the action. Shak.

6. In physiol. any one of the active processes going on in an organized body; some manifestation of vital activity; the performance of a function; as, the action of the stomach or the gastric juice on the food; a morbid action of the liver. Among these actions some are distinguished as voluntary, as the contractions of the voluntary muscles; involuntary, as those of the lungs and heart; mixed, as those of respiration, deglutition, &c.; reflex, which doubtless include most involuntary actions, but correspond also to those performed by voluntary muscles under the influence of stimuli which do not reach the consciousness. — 7. In law, (a) a suit or process, by which a demand is made of a right; a claim made before a tribunal. Actions are real, personal, or mixed; real, or feudal, when the demandant claims a title to real estate; personal, when a man demands a debt, personal duty, or damages in lieu of it, or satisfaction for an injury to person or property; and mixed, when real estate is demanded, with damages for a wrong sustained. Actions are also civil or penal; civil, when instituted solely in behalf of private persons, to recover debts or damages; penal, when instituted to recover a penalty imposed by way of punishment. (b) The right of bringing an action; as, the law gives an action for every claim. — 8. [A French usage.] A share in the capital stock of a company, or in the public funds; in the plural, stocks. — 9. In painting and sculpt. (a) the attitude or position of the several parts of the body, as expressive of the passions or emotions by which it is actuated. (b) The effect of a figure or figures acting together. (c) The principal event which forms the subject of a picture or bas-relief. — 10. Battle; fight; engagement between troops, whether on land or water.

How many gentlemen have you lost in this action? Shak.

11. The mechanism of a pianoforte, organ, or other compound instrument of the same kind. — 12. The movement or works of a watch or clock. — 13. In the manège, general movements of the limbs and body; as, a horse of fine action. — Quantity of action, in physics, the product of the mass of a body by the space it runs through and its velocity. — Principle of least action, Lagrange's name for a law of motion which he enunciates thus: — 'In a system of moving bodies, the sum of the products of the masses of the bodies by the integral of the products of the velocities, and the elements of the spaces passed over is constantly a maximum or minimum.' — Action, Act. In many cases action and act are synonymous, but some distinction between them is observable. Action seems to have more relation to the power that acts, and its operation and process of acting; and act more relation to the effect or operation complete. Action is also more generally used for ordinary transactions, and act for such as are remarkable or dignified; as, all our actions should be regulated by prudence; a prince is distinguished by acts of heroism or humanity. Act is individual, but we speak of a course of action.

Actionable (ak'shon-a-bl), a. Furnishing ground for an action at law; characterized by something for which an action at law may be sustained; as, to call a man a thief is actionable.

Actionably (ak'shon-a-bli), adv. In an actionable manner; in a manner that may subject to legal process.

Actionary, Actionist (ak'shon-a-ri, ak'shon-ist), n. A proprietor of stock in a joint-stock company; one who owns actions or shares of stock. [Rare.]

Action-taking (ak'shon-tā-king), a. Litigious; accustomed to seek redress by law in place of by the sword; a term of contempt. 'A lily-livered, action-taking knave.' Shak.

Actions (ak'shus), a. Active; full of activity. Warner. [Very rare.]

Actitation (ak-ti-tā'shon), n. [L. actio, actitum, to act or plead frequently, only spoken of lawsuits and dramas; double freq. from ago, actum, to act.] Frequent action; specifically, the debating of lawsuits. [Rare.]

Activate (ak'tiv-āt), v. t. To make active; to intensify.

Snow and ice, especially being hoopen, and their cold activated by nitre or salt, will turn water to ice, and that in a few hours. Bacon.

Active (ak'tiv), a. [L. actīvus; Fr. actif, actif. See ACT.] 1. Having the power or property of acting; having the property of causing change or communicating action or motion; having the power to exert an influence; as, attraction is an active power; the active powers of the mind: opposed to passive. — 2. Having the power of quick motion, or disposition to move with speed; nimble; lively; brisk; agile; as, an active animal. Hence — 3. Busy; constantly engaged in action; pursuing business with vigour and assiduity; opposed to dull, slow, or indolent; as, an active officer. It is also opposed to sedentary; as, an active life. Hence — 4. In com. indicating much business; as, an active demand for iron; freights are active. — 5. In a state of action, operation, or motion; actually proceeding; accompanied by overt action; opposed to dormant or suspended. 'Active hostilities.' Motley.

The dangerous hath had in these men fresh experience how wonderful such active errors are. Hobbes.

6. In med. applied to certain medicines which produce quick and notable changes upon the body; also, to the method of treatment in which active remedies are used. — 7. Requiring action or exertion; practical; operative; producing real effects; opposed to speculative; as, the active duties of life. — 8. In gram. (a) with some grammarians, expressing action; as, an active verb. Active verbs are subdivided into two classes, namely, active intransitive and active transitive; the former implying action confined to the actor; as, I walk, run, think; the latter action passing from the actor to an object; as, I chase the hare; I teach the boy. (b) With other grammarians, same as Transitive. — Active capital or wealth, money or property that may readily be converted into money, and used in commerce or other employment for profit. — Active commerce, the commerce in which a nation carries its own and foreign commodities in its own ships, or which is prosecuted by its own citizens, as contradistinguished from passive, in which the productions of one country are transported by the people of another. — Active or living force, in physics, same as Via viva (which see). — Active symptoms, in pathol. symptoms of excitement. — SYN. Agile, alert, brisk, vigorous, nimble, lively, quick, sprightly, prompt, industrious, operative.

Actress (ak'tres), n. A female who acts or performs anything.

Virgil has, indeed, admitted Fame as an actress in the kind. Addison.

Specifically, a female who represents or acts a part in a play. [In explanation of numerous passages in our old plays, it is to be observed that actresses were not introduced till after the Restoration. In Shakspeare's time female parts were performed by boys. 'The king, one night, was impatient to have the play begin. "Sirs," said Davenant, "they are shaving the queen." Memoirs of Count de Grammont.]

Acts of the Apostles. One of the books of the New Testament, the authorship of which is commonly ascribed to St. Luke. It begins with the ascension of Christ, and gives an account of the early spread of the gospel, and more especially of the part played therein by St. Paul, little being said of the other apostles except St. Peter. The narrative comes down to 62 A.D.

Actual (ak'tu-al), a. 1. Acting or existing really and objectively; existing in act; real; effectively operative; effectual: opposed to virtual, potential, nominal, speculative.

The actual cautery, or the burning the body by a red-hot iron, is opposed to the virtual cautery, which produces the same effect, in a different way, by means of caustics and escharotics. Cruikshank.

So Alceus was a cobbler, even when not at work, that in, he was a cobbler potential; whereas, when busy in his booth, he was a cobbler actual.

Sir W. Hamilton.

Peter the Great, introducing new offices, nominated the eldest Boyars, or those of the first class actual privy-councillors; and those of the second class privy-councillors. Brougham.

Admiral (ad'mi-ral), n. [O. E. amirāl, amirāl, amirāl, amirāl, Fr. amiral, It. amiraglio, L. L. amiratus, from Ar. amir, emir, a prince, chief, with the Ar. article suffixed, being supposed by Diez to be a contraction of such forms as amir-ul-mā, ruler of the water, or amir-ul-bā'kr, ruler of the sea; Ar. amr, or amrā, to command; Heb. amar, Chal. amr, to say, to command.] 1. A naval officer of the highest rank; a commander-in-chief of a fleet or navy.

In the British navy admirals were formerly divided into three classes, named after the colours of their respective flags, admirals of the red, of the white, and of the blue, with vice-admirals and rear-admirals of each flag. In 1864, however, this distinction was given up, and now there is one flag common to all ships of war, namely, the white ensign divided into four quarters by the cross of St. George, and having the Union in the upper corner next the staff; while, instead of nine, there are now only three degrees of this rank, namely, admiral, vice-admiral, and rear-admiral. The admiral displays his flag at the maintop-gallant-mast head.—

Admiral of the fleet, an honorary title of distinction conferred on a few admirals, and carrying an increase of pay along with it.

Vice-admiral, (a) an officer next in rank and command to the admiral. He carries his flag at the foretop-gallant-mast head. (b) A name also given to certain officers, as the lords-lieutenant of counties, governors of colonies, &c., who have power to hold courts of vice-admiralty. — Rear-admiral, an officer next in rank to the vice-admiral. He carries his flag at the mizen-top-gallant-mast head. — Lord high admiral, in Great Britain, an officer who (when this rare dignity is conferred) is at the head of the naval administration of Great Britain. There have been few high admirals since 1632, when the office was first put in commission. James Duke of York (afterwards James II.) held it for several years during Charles II.'s reign. In the reign of William and Mary it was vested in lords commissioners of the admiralty, and since that time it has been held for short periods only by Prince George of Denmark in the time of Queen Anne, and by William IV., then Duke of Clarence, in 1827-28. The lords commissioners of the admiralty were formerly seven, but are now four in number, with the addition of a civil lord; the first lord is always a member of the cabinet, and it is he who principally exercises the powers of the office. — 2. The ship which carries the admiral; also, the most considerable ship of any fleet, as of merchantmen or of fishing vessels. (Milton uses the form Admiral (which see) in this sense.)

The admiral of the Spanish Armada was a Flemish ship.

Like some mighty admiral, dark and terrible, bearing down upon his antagonist with all his canvas straining to the wind, and all his thunders roaring from his broadsides.

3. A name given to two species of butterflies: Vanessa atalanta, or red admiral, and Limenitis camilla, or white admiral.

Admiral (ad-mi-ral), a. Carrying an admiral; chief in a fleet.

The admiral galley . . . struck upon a rock.

Admiral-shell (ad-mi-ral-she), n. The popular name of a sub-genus of magnificent shells of the genus Voluta. See VOLUTA.

Admiralship (ad-mi-ral-ship), n. The office or power of an admiral. [Rare.]

Admiralty (ad-mi-ral-ti), n. 1. The office and jurisdiction of the lords commissioners appointed to take the general management of maritime affairs, and of all matters relating to the royal navy, with the government of its various departments. — 2. The officers appointed for the administration of naval affairs; a board of naval commissioners. The lords commissioners of the admiralty are now four in number, exclusive of a civil lord. See under ADMIRAL. — 3. The building in which the lords of the admiralty transact business, and in which the clerks and other officials connected with this department are employed. — Admiralty court, or court of admiralty, a tribunal having jurisdiction over maritime causes, whether of a civil or criminal nature. It was formerly held before the lord high admiral, and was afterwards presided over by his deputy or the deputy of the lords commissioners. It now forms a branch of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty division of the High Court of Justice, the judge in it being appointed by the crown as one of the judges of the High Court. The court of admiralty is twofold: the instance court and the prize court. The civil jurisdiction of the instance court extends generally to such contracts as are made upon the sea, and are founded in maritime service or consideration. It also regulates many other points of maritime law — as disputes between part-owners of vessels, and questions relating to salvage. It has likewise power to inquire into certain wrongs or injuries committed on the high seas, as in cases of collision. In criminal matters the court of admiralty has, partly by common law and partly by a variety of statutes, cognizance of piracy and all other indictable offences committed either upon the sea, or on the coasts when beyond the limits of any English county. The prize court is the only tribunal for deciding what is and what is not lawful prize, and for adjudicating upon all matters, civil and criminal, relating to prize, or every acquisition made by the law of war, which is either itself of a maritime character, or is made, whether at sea or by land, by a naval force. The court of admiralty for Scotland was abolished by 1 William IV. 1830, and the cases formerly brought before this court are now prosecuted in the Court of Session or in the sheriff court, in the same way as ordinary civil causes. — Droits of Admiralty. See DROITS.

Adultery (a-dul'tēr-i), n. [L. adulterium. See ADULTERATE.] 1. Violation of the marriage-bed; a crime or a civil injury which introduces or may introduce a spurious offspring into a family. When committed between two married persons it is sometimes termed double adultery; and when only one of the parties is married it is termed single adultery. In many continental countries adultery is regarded as a criminal offence, but in none does the punishment exceed imprisonment for a short period accompanied by a fine. In England, formerly, it was punished by fine and imprisonment, and in Scotland it was frequently made a capital offence. In Great Britain at the present day, however, it is punishable only by ecclesiastical censure. But when committed by the wife, adultery is regarded as a civil injury, and forms the ground of an action of damages against the paramour. No corresponding action is competent to the wife either in England or America. Adultery forms the most common ground of divorce. See DIVORCE.—2. In Script. (a) all manner of lewdness or unchastity, as forbidden by the seventh commandment. Mat. v. 28. (b) Idolatry or apostasy from the true God. Jer. lvi. 8.—3. Adze, Adz (adz), n. [O E. adde, a Sax. adde as adze] A cutting instrument used for chipping the surface of timber. It consists of a blade of iron turning a portion of a cylindrical surface ground to an edge from the concave side outwards at one end, and having a hole or socket at the other end for the handle.

Adze (adz), v. t. To chip or shape with an adze, as, to adze logs of timber.

A. The symbol used to denote the third class of woodens and composite ships in Lloyd's register. See A1.

Admodum (ad'mo-dum), n. [L. from Gr. admodum, a point, and admodum, a tooth] A genus of fossil ganoid fishes, family Lepidodont remarkable for their small, sharp-pointed teeth, found in the Silurian.

Adonis (a-din'-is), n. [L.] Same as Adonis.

Adonid (a-don'id), a. [See ad, one, and adonid, fold.] 1. Unseen, upright, without duplicity. 2. Rarely used to denote the unity of the divine essence in a triunity of persons. See Adon.

Adonidness (a-don'id-ness), n. Honesty; uprightness. straightforwardness, singlemindedness, freedom from duplicity [Scottish].

Adonid (a-don'id), n. [Gr. adonid — adon, a root, and adonid, a fold.] A wild species of box (Cypraea adonid) found in troops on the Caucasus and many Asiatic mountains. It is believed to be the original source of at least one variety of the domestic goat. In its stomach and intestines, as in those of other artiodactyls, are found the cestodes called beaver-cestes.

Adonid (a-don'id), n. See ADONIS.

Adonid (a-don'id), n. [From the typical genus Adonid, which name again is taken from that of the Roman nymph Adonid] A family of Lepidoptera, section Heterocera, comprising a moderate number of interesting insects. The larva live in the interior of the branches or roots of trees. Some of them feed upon the apple. One species (Adonid typica) is destructive to current-bushes, feeding on the pith.

Adonid (a-don'id), n. [Gr. adonid, a goat, and adonid, a horn] A genus of small from nat. order Myrmecophaga, natives of the swampy shores of India and Australia. Their heads terminate while still on the tree, and send down perpendicular roots into the mud, and thus form impenetrable thickets, constituting the only vegetation for miles along some coasts, particularly of Sumatra.

Adonid (a-don'id), n. Same as Adonid.

Adonid (a-don'id), n. Same as Adonid.

Adonid (a-don'id), n. [Gr. adonid, a goat skin, the goat, goat, etc., a goat] 1. In Adonid myth. originally the skin of the goat Amalthea which suckled Zeus, and which skin was afterwards worn by him as part of his armor or as a covering of his shield, also the shield itself. In later times the adonid was represented as part of the armor of Pallas Athena, and appears as a kind of breastplate covered with metal scales, and made terrible by the head of the Gorgon Medusa, being also fringed with serpents.

Palms waving the Adonid.—From an antique statue.

Hence — 2. Anything that protects. 'Under the imperial adonid' Greaves.

Adonid (a-don'id), n. [Gr. adonid, splendour, a female name in Greek mythology] A genus of plants, nat. order Aurantaceae, with separate stamens. A Adonid (the Bengal quince golden apple, or bell) has a delicious spiciferous fruit, somewhat like an orange. A perfume and a yellow dye are got from the rind, and a cement from the mucus of the seed.

Adonid (a-don'id), n. Same as Adonid.

Adonid (a-don'id), n. Same as Adonid. Adonid (a-don'id), n. [L. adonid, a sick] In Adonid waterworks, a medical certificate given to a student showing that he has been prevented by sickness from attending to his duties.

Adonid (a-don'id), n. [L. adonid, gent. Adonid or Adonid] An epic poem written by Virgil, of which Adonid, a Trojan, is the hero. It describes the taking of Troy by the Greeks, the subsequent wanderings of Adonid, and the final settlement of himself and companions in Italy.

Adonid (a-don'id), n. Same as Adonid.

Adonid (a-don'id), n. See BOLIC. Adonid (a-don'id), n. pl. A family of unibranchiate gastropod mollusks. See BOLIC.

Adonid (a-don'id), n. [From Adonid, the god of the winds] A modification of the accordion invented by Wheatstone before the concertina.

Adonid (a-don'id), n. Same as Adonid.

Adonid (a-don'id), n. [From Adonid, the god of the winds, and Adonid, a bird.] A genus of psittacine birds found fossil in Madagascar. It had three toes like Dinornis, but it is not certain whether it ought to be classed with the caracal birds or with the raptorial.

In Adonid measured 16 inches in length; the bird which laid them may well have been the roc of eastern tradition. Written also Adonid.

Adonid (a-don'id), n. [Gr. adonid, a goat, high, and adonid, a bird.] A genus of psittacine birds found fossil in Madagascar. It had three toes like Dinornis, but it is not certain whether it ought to be classed with the caracal birds or with the raptorial.

In Adonid measured 16 inches in length; the bird which laid them may well have been the roc of eastern tradition. Written also Adonid.

Adonid (a-don'id), n. Same as Adonid. Adonid (a-don'id), n. [L. adonid, from adonid, a goat, and adonid, a bird.] A genus of psittacine birds found fossil in Madagascar. It had three toes like Dinornis, but it is not certain whether it ought to be classed with the caracal birds or with the raptorial.

In Adonid measured 16 inches in length; the bird which laid them may well have been the roc of eastern tradition. Written also Adonid.

Adonid (a-don'id), n. Same as Adonid. Adonid (a-don'id), n. [L. adonid, from adonid, a goat, and adonid, a bird.] A genus of psittacine birds found fossil in Madagascar. It had three toes like Dinornis, but it is not certain whether it ought to be classed with the caracal birds or with the raptorial.

In Adonid measured 16 inches in length; the bird which laid them may well have been the roc of eastern tradition. Written also Adonid.

Adonid (a-don'id), n. Same as Adonid. Adonid (a-don'id), n. [L. adonid, from adonid, a goat, and adonid, a bird.] A genus of psittacine birds found fossil in Madagascar. It had three toes like Dinornis, but it is not certain whether it ought to be classed with the caracal birds or with the raptorial.

In Adonid measured 16 inches in length; the bird which laid them may well have been the roc of eastern tradition. Written also Adonid.

Adonid (a-don'id), n. Same as Adonid. Adonid (a-don'id), n. [L. adonid, from adonid, a goat, and adonid, a bird.] A genus of psittacine birds found fossil in Madagascar. It had three toes like Dinornis, but it is not certain whether it ought to be classed with the caracal birds or with the raptorial.

In Adonid measured 16 inches in length; the bird which laid them may well have been the roc of eastern tradition. Written also Adonid.

Adonid (a-don'id), n. Same as Adonid. Adonid (a-don'id), n. [L. adonid, from adonid, a goat, and adonid, a bird.] A genus of psittacine birds found fossil in Madagascar. It had three toes like Dinornis, but it is not certain whether it ought to be classed with the caracal birds or with the raptorial.

of ginger or extract of capsaicum mixed with sugar placed in the bottles before filling them converts this into plagiodon; while essence of lemon, with citric acid and sugar, gives lemonade. All waters from natural springs is more or less aerated, and the gas, nowish taste of recently boiled water is due to the absence of carbonic acid gas and atmospheric air. Aerated waters are made on a small scale for domestic use by means of a gasogene, in which bicarbonate of soda and tartaric acid are used to evolve the carbonic acid.

Aeration (a-er-a'shun), n. 1. The act or operation of combining or saturating with a gas, as carbonic acid or common air. — 2. In physics, the change in the circulating fluids of animals effected by the agency of air, as the arterialization of the venous blood by respiration in the higher animals and the corresponding changes in the lower animals. — 3. Aeration of acids, the exposing of them to the action of air by means of plunging, harrowing, &c.

Aerator (a-er-a'tor), n. [L. aeo, the air] 1. A blower, a contrivance for fanning wheat and other cereals, to bleach it and destroy fungi and insects. — 2. An apparatus for making aerated waters.

Aerial (a-er'i-al), a. [L. aer, the air, a. 1. Belonging or pertaining to the air or atmosphere. Inhabiting or frequenting the air, growing, existing, or happening in the air, produced by or in the air, as aerial regions, aerial perspective, aerial navigation, aerial roots, aerial music. The aerial blue. Shut. Aerial honey and aerobal dew. Dryden. — 2. Consisting of air, partaking of the nature of air, as aerial particles. — 3. Reaching far into the air, high; lofty, elevated, as aerial sphere, aerial flight. — 4. Possessed of a light and graceful beauty.

Some critics to observe that small music is harmonic too. 1. The harmonic and harmonic are also some of the aerial compositions of the older Italian.

Calculus.

— Aerial acid, an old name for carbonic acid, from a belief that it entered into the composition of atmospheric air. — Aerial plants, those which absorb their food from the atmosphere, as lichens, epiphytal orchids, &c. — Aerial perspective See under PERSPECTIVE. — Aerial tints, in painting, tints or modifications of colour by which the expression of distance is attained. — Aerial figures those by which painters seek to represent the fabled inhabitants of the air, as demons, genii, gnomes, &c. — Aerial images, images which are caused by the convergence of rays of light reflected or refracted from objects through strata of air of different densities, the images appearing suspended in the air as the different kinds of mirage also those images perceived by looking into or towards a concave mirror. — Aerial potage Same as Neuma. — Aerial railway, a railway supported in the air by posts, such as is to be seen in some of the towns of the United States. — Aerial roads, in post same as Indian roads (which see under INDIAN).

Aerially (a-er'i-al-ly), adv. In an aerial manner, as to communicate air or the atmosphere.

Your eyes Touched with a wonderful darkness here, And how awfully blue. Freeman.

Aerial (a-er'i-an), n. Adonid, one of a branch of Adonid, so called from Adonid, who maintained that there is no difference between bishops and priests.

Aerides (a-er'i-des), n. [L. aeo, the air] A genus of epiphytal plants, nat. order Orchidaceae. These plants have distichous leaves, and large brightly coloured and erect-seeded flowers. They are natives of the warmer parts of Asia, and are extensively cultivated in hothouses.

Aerie (a-er'i), n. [Fr. aerie, aerie, aerie, aerie, aerie, an aerie, Littré, Mahn, and Fr. Maller refer all these forms to the L. aerie, an aerie, an aerie, a plot or bed of ground, &c.; in later times a waste unutilized place, though the connection of meanings is not very clear, probably L. aeo, air may have had some influence on the form of the word, aerie being situated aloft in the air. Wedgwood considers aerie to have been the origin of the word through the notions of air, climate, and hence residence.] 1. The nest of a bird of prey, as of an eagle or hawk. — 2. A brood of eagles or hawks. — 3. An eagle. (Rare)

Your aerie buildeth in our aerie nest. Shakspeare.

4. An elevated spot. [Rare and poetical.]

Wherever beauty dwell,
Is golf or arrie, mountain or deep dell. Keats.

Written also Byrry, Eyrrie.

Aeriferous (â-er-î-fer-us), a. [L. aer, air, and fero, to carry.] Conveying air, as the larynx and bronchial tubes, and the trachea of insects.

Aerification (â-er-i-fî-kâ-shon), n. 1. The act of combining air with anything; the state of being filled with air.—2. The act of becoming air or of changing into an aeriform state, as substances which are converted from a liquid or solid form into gas or an elastic vapour; the state of being aeriform.

Aeriform (â-er-i-form), a. [L. aer, air, and forma, form.] Having the form or nature of air, or of an elastic invisible fluid. The gases are aeriform fluids.

Aerify (â-er-i-fî), v.t. pret. & pp. aerified; pp. aerifying. [L. aer, air, and facio, to make.] 1. To infuse air into; to fill with air, or to combine air with.—2. To change into an aeriform state.

Aerogyst (â-er-ô-gist), n. [Gr. aër, air, and gystis, a bladder.] In bot. the air-vessel, or bladder, by means of which many algae, as Fucus vesiculosus, are supported in the water, and oceanic species, as the Gulf-weed, float on the surface.

Aerodynamics (â-er-ô-di-nam-iks), n. [Gr. aër, air, and dynamis, power.] The science which treats of the motion of the air and other gases, or of their properties and mechanical effects when put in motion.

Aerography, Aerography (â-er-ô-grô-fî), n. [Gr. aër, air, and grôsis, knowledge, graphô, to describe.] Aerology (which see) [Rare.]

Aerohydrodynamic (â-er-ô-hî-drô-di-nam-iks), a. [Gr. aër, air, hydro, water, and dynamis, power.] Acting by the power of air and water.—Aerohydrodynamic wheel, an apparatus invented by M. Calles, a Belgian engineer, for transmitting power to a great distance. It consists of a wheel submerged in water, under which air forcibly driven through a tube is discharged so as in ascending to make the wheel revolve. E. H. Knight.

Aerolite (â-er-ô-lî-t), n. [Gr. aër, air, and lithos, a stone.] A stone falling from the air or atmospheric regions; a meteoric stone; a meteorite. There have been many conjectures as to the source of aerolites. By some they have been supposed to be projected by lunar volcanoes to a distance beyond the sphere of the moon's attraction; by others they have been thought to be formed in the air by the union of simpler forms of matter volatilized from the earth's surface; but they are, most probably, cometary bodies of the same nature as shooting-stars, revolving round the earth, and falling into it when they come within the sphere of its attraction. Some of them are large, weighing 15 tons. They are all found to agree in their constituent parts, and are covered with a thin, slag-like crust of a deep black colour, probably produced by strong, transient heating in their rapid passage through the air. Their exterior is roughened with small projections, and they are destitute of gloss. Internally their texture is granulated, and of a grayish colour; they appear composed of a number of small spherical bodies and metallic grains imbedded in a softer matter. When analyzed they are found to consist of twenty-two of the elements found in terrestrial minerals, the most prominent components being malleable metallic iron and nickel.

Aerolith (â-er-ô-lî-th), n. Same as Aerolite.

Aerolithology (â-er-ô-lî-th-ô-lô-jî), n. [Gr. aër, air, lithos, a stone, and logos, discourse.] The science of aerolites. Dana.

Aerolitic (â-er-ô-lî-tîk), a. Relating to aerolites.

Aerology (â-er-ô-lô-jî), n. [Gr. aër, aeros, air, and logos, description.] That branch of physics which treats of the air, its constituent parts, properties, and phenomena.

Aeromancy (â-er-ô-man-â), n. [Gr. aër, air, and manêia, divination.] Divination by means of the air and winds or atmospheric substances: now sometimes used to denote the practice of forecasting changes in the weather.

Aerometer (â-er-om-et-er), n. [Gr. aër, air, and metron, measure.] An instrument for weighing air, or for ascertaining the density of air and gases.

Aerometric (â-er-ô-met-rik), a. Pertaining to aerometry; measuring air.

Aerometry (â-er-om-et-ri), n. The science of measuring the weight or density of air and gases, including the doctrine of its pressure, elasticity, rarefaction, and condensation.

Aeronaut (â-er-ô-nat), n. [Gr. aër, air, and nautes, a sailor, from naus, a ship.] One who sails or floats in the air; an aerial navigator; a balloonist.

Aeronautic, Aeronautical (â-er-ô-nat-ik), a. Pertaining to aeronautics or aerial sailing.

Aeronautics (â-er-ô-nat-iks), n. The doctrine, science, or art of floating in the air, as by means of a balloon.

Aeronautism (â-er-ô-nat-izm), n. The practice of ascending and floating in the atmosphere, as in balloons.

Aerophane (â-er-ô-fan), n. [Gr. aër, air, and phanos, light, bright.] A light kind of gauze or imitation crape. E. H. Knight.

Aerophobia (â-er-ô-fô-bî-a), n. [Gr. aër, air, and phobos, fear.] A dread of air, that is, of a current of air: a symptom common in cases of hydrophobia, and occasionally observed in other diseases.

Aerophyte (â-er-ô-fî-t), n. [Gr. aër, air, and phyton, a plant.] A plant which lives exclusively in air, absorbing all its food from it alone, as some orchids and bromeliads; an aerial plant. See EPHYPHYTE.

Aeroseopy, Aeroseopy (â-er-ô-skep-sî, â-er-ô-ko-pl), n. [Gr. aër, air, and skopô, to explore.] 1. The investigation or observation of the state and variations of the atmosphere.—2. The faculty of perception by the medium of the air, supposed to reside in the antennae of insects.

Aerostite (â-er-ô-sî-t), n. Dark red silver ore; pyrrargyrite.

Aerosphere (â-er-ô-sfêr), n. Same as Atmosphere.

Aerostat (â-er-ô-stat), n. [Gr. aër, air, and statos, sustaining, from histêmi, to stand.] A machine or vessel sustaining weights in the air; a name given to air-balloons.

Aerostatic, Aerostatical (â-er-ô-stat-ik), a. 1. Pertaining to aerostatics.—2. Pertaining to aerostation, or the art of aerial navigation.—Aerostatic press, a machine for extracting the colouring matter from dye-stuffs. It consists of a box divided in the centre by a perforated plate. On this the dye-stuff is placed, and a second plate similarly pierced is placed above it. The extracting liquor is poured on the top, and on the air being exhausted from the under part of the vessel the liquor is forced through the substance by atmospheric pressure.—Aerostatic balance, an instrument, on the principle of the barometer, for ascertaining the weight of the air.

Aerostatics (â-er-ô-stat-iks), n. 1. The science which treats of the weight, pressure, and equilibrium of air and other elastic fluids, and of the equilibrium of bodies sustained in them.—2. Aerostation (which see).

Aerostation (â-er-ô-stâ-shon), n. 1. Aerial navigation; the science of raising, suspending, and guiding machines in the air, or of ascending in air-balloons.—2. The science of aerostatics. [Rare.]

Aero-steam Engine (â-er-ô-stêm-en-jîn), n. [Gr. aër, air, and E. steam-engine.] An engine in which the expansive power of combined heated air and steam is used in driving a piston. E. H. Knight.

Aeruginous, Eruuginous (â-rû-jîn-us, â-rû-jîn-ûs), a. [L. âeruginosus, from âerugo, rust of copper.] 1. Partaking of verdigris or the rust of copper, or pertaining to that substance.—2. Resembling verdigris in appearance.

âerugo (â-rû-gô), n. [L.] Verdigris (which see).—âerugo nobilis, a greenish crust found on antique bronzes, of the same composition as the mineral atacamite (which see).

Aery (â-er-î), a. Aairy; breezy; exposed to the air; elevated; lofty. [Rare and poetical.]

The shepherd's pipe came clear from aery steep. Keats.

Aery-light (â-er-i-lî-t), a. Light as air.

âechynanthus (â-ek-in-an-thus), n. [Gr. âechynomai, to be modest, and anthos, a flower.] A genus of beautiful epiphyllal plants, natives of tropical Asia, nat. order Gesneraceae, with pendent stems and scarlet or orange flowers. They are among the most splendid ornaments of our hothouses.

âeschynite. Same as âechynite.

âesculaceæ (â-ê-kû-lâ-sê-ê), n. [L. âesculus, the winter or Italian oak.] A group of plants, also called Hippocastaneæ, included in the Sapindaceæ. The species are handsome trees or small bushes, chiefly remarkable for their large seeds, with an extensive hilum. The seeds are bitter, and contain a large quantity of starch and a considerable proportion of potash. They are used as food, and also as cosmetics. The horse-chestnut belongs to this group. See HIPPOCASTANEÆ.

âesculus (â-ê-kû-lus), n. [L.] The horse-chestnut, a genus of trees. See HORSCHHESTNUT.

âêir (â-ê-er), n. [Nom. pl. of Icel. âes, a god.] In Scand. myth. the general name for the heathen gods of Scandinavia. See âê.

âesthesia (â-ê-thê-sî-a), n. [Gr. âisthêsis, sensibility.] Perception; feeling; sensibility. See ANÆSTHESIA.

âesthesiometer (â-ê-thê-sî-om-et-êr), n. [Gr. âisthêsis, perception, from âisthanomai, to perceive, and metron, a measure.] In med. an instrument for testing the tactile sensibility of the human body in health and disease, by ascertaining, through the application of the points of the instrument to the skin, the shortest distance at which two points can be perceived as distinctly separate.

âesthetic, âsthetical (â-ê-thet-ik, â-ê-thet-ik-al), a. [Gr. âisthêtikos, from âisthanomai, to perceive by the senses.] 1. Pertaining to the science of taste or beauty; pertaining to the sense of the beautiful.—2. In metaph. pertaining to sensation.

âesthetic, âsthetick (â-ê-thet-ik), n. In metaph. the doctrine of sensation.—Transcendental æsthetic, in the Kantian philosophy, the doctrine of pure sensation, or that part of the Kantian metaphysics which treats of what is given in sense independently of all experience, namely, of what Kant calls the forms of sensation, space, and time.

âesthetically (â-ê-thet-ik-al-lî), adv. According to the principles of æsthetics; with reference to the sense of the beautiful.

âestheticism (â-ê-thet-î-sî-izm), n. 1. The principles or doctrines of æsthetics.—2. Attachment to æsthetics; a proneness to indulge and cultivate the sense of the beautiful.

âethetics (â-ê-thet-iks), n. The science of deducing from nature and taste the rules and principles of art; the theory of the fine arts; the science or that branch of philosophy which deals with the beautiful; the doctrines of taste. Written also âesthetics.

âetho-physiology (â-ê-thô-fî-zî-ô-fî-jî), n. [Gr. âisthanomai, to perceive, and E. physiology.] The physiology of sensation; that part of physiology which treats of the organs of sense and the parts of the body which exercise subsidiary functions. H. Spencer.

âetheriferous (â-ê-thî-fer-us), a. [L. âether, heat, and fero, to bear.] Producing heat.

âetival, a. Same as âetivai.

âetivai, v.t. Same as âetivare.

âetivation. See ESTIVATION.

âethogamous (â-ê-thê-og-a-mus), a. [Gr. âethos, unusual, and gamos, marriage.] In bot. a term applied to denote such plants as propagate themselves in an unusual manner; originally proposed as a substitute for cryptogamic (which see); but restricted by DeCandolle to such plants as have vessels as well as cellular tissue, such, namely, as ferns, lycopodiums, and their allies.

âether. Same as âether.

âethiops Mineral. See Ethiops Mineral.

âethroscope (â-ê-thî-ô-skôp), n. [Gr. âithros, clear, pertaining to the open air, and skopô, to see.] An instrument for measuring the minute variations of temperature due to different conditions of the sky. It consists of a differential thermometer, both bulbs of which are within a cup-shaped mirror, one of them in the focus of the mirror, so as to be peculiarly affected on being exposed to the sky. The cup is kept covered with a lid, except when the instrument is being used.

âethusa (â-ê-thû-sa), n. [Gr. âithô, to burn.] A genus of poisonous plants, nat. order Umbelliferae. â. Cynapium is fool's parsley (which see).

âethiology. See ETIOLOGY.

âéthies (â-ê-thî-ês), n. [Gr., from âetos, an eagle.] Same as Eagle-stone.

âface (â-fâs), adv. [Prefix a, in, and face.] In face; in front. 'Right âface of him.' Lever.

Afar (a-fär'), adv. [Prefix a, in, at, and fär; A. Sax. of for. See FAR.] At a distance in place; to or from a distance: used absolutely, or with from preceding or off following or both; as, he was seen from afar, or from afar off; I saw him afar off.

The steep where Fame's proud temple shines afar. Beattie

[Shakespeare uses afar off in the sense of indirectly. 'A kind of tender, made afar off by Sir Hugh here.']

Afard (a-färd'), a. [O. E. afærd, A. Sax. afæred, pp. of afæran, to frighten.] Afraid. Be not afard; the idle is full of noises. Shak.

Afer (ä-fär'), n. [L.] The south-west wind. Milton.

Aff (af), prep. or adv. [Scotch.] Off.—Aff-hands, hands off.—Aff-loof, right off from memory; without reserve; frankly.

Aye free aff-han' your story tell,
When wi' a bosom croon. Burns.

Affa (affa), n. A weight used on the Guinea coast, equal to an ounce.

Affability (af-fa-bil'i-ti), n. [See AFFABLE.] The quality of being affable; readiness to converse; civility and courteousness in receiving others, and in conversation; ready condescension; benignity; mildness.

Hearing of her beauty, and her wit,
Her affability and bashful modesty,
Her wondrous qualities, and mild behaviour. Shak.

SYN. Courtesy, courteousness, urbanity, civility, complaisance.

Affable (af-fa-bl'), a. [L. affabilis, affable—af for ad, to, fari, to speak.] 1. Easy of conversation; admitting others to free conversation without reserve; courteous; complaisant; of easy manners; condescending; kind or benevolent in manner; now usually applied to superiors; as, an affable prince. 'An affable and courteous gentleman. Shak. 'Affable wolves, meek bears. Shak.—2. Expressing or betokening affability; mild; benign; as, an affable countenance: opposed to forbidding.—SYN. Courteous, civil, complaisant, accessible, mild, benign, condescending.

Affableness (af-fa-bl'-nes), n. Affability.

Affably (af-fa-bl'), adv. In an affable manner; courteously; invitingly.

Affabrous (af-fa-brus'), a. [L. affaber, skillful—ad, and faber, an artist.] Skillfully made. Bailey.

Affabulation (af-fa-bu-lä'shon), n. [L. affabulatio—ad, to, and fabula, a fable.] The moral of a fable. Bailey.

Affained (ä-fänd'), p. and a. [Prefix a for ad, to, and feign.] Laid to one's charge falsely or feignedly.

Errors maliciously affained to him. By. Hall.

After-thought (aft'er-thāt), n. Reflection after an act; some consideration that occurs to one's mind too late, or after the performance of the act to which it refers.

After-thought, and idle care,
And doubts of motley hue, and dark despair. Dryden.

After-time (aft'er-tīm), n. Succeeding time.

Wheresoever I am sung or told,
In after-time, this also shall be known. Tennyson.

More commonly used in the plural.

The mere possession of a fief, or even of a dignity, though originally a means of acquiring nobility, did not of itself confer it in after-times. Brougham.

Afterward, Afterwards (aft'er-wērd, aft'er-wērdz), adv. [A. Sax. afterswārd. See WARD.] In later or subsequent time.

After-wise (aft'er-wīz), a. Wise after the event; wise when it is too late; after-witted.

There are such as we may call the after-wise, who, when any project fails, foresee all the inconveniences that would arise from it, though they kept their thoughts to themselves. Addison.

After-wit (aft'er-wit), n. Wisdom that comes too late.

There is no recalling of what's gone and past; so that after-wit comes too late when the mischief is done. Sir R. L'Estrange.

After-wits are dearly bought,
Let thy fore-wit guide thy thought. Southwell.

After-witted (aft'er-wit-ed), a. Characterized by after-wit; circumspect when it is too late; after-wise.

Our fashions of eating make us slothful and un-luxury to labour . . . after-witted (as we call it), un-circumspect, inconsiderate, heady, rash. Tyndale.

After-yard (aft'er-yārd), n. Naut. a yard belonging to the miszen-mast.

Aft-meal (aft'mēl), n. A meal as an accessory to the main meal, as dessert to dinner; an after or late meal.

At aft-meals who shall pay for the wine? Thynne.

Is my kinsman, whom the king hath wronged. Shak.

4. Moreover; besides; further.

An heretic, an arch one, Cranmer. Shak.

5. In return; back; in answer; in restitution. I knit my handkerchief about your brows;
And I did never ask it you again. Shak.

Bring us word again which way we shall go. Deut. i. 22.

6. Anywhere else; in any other place.

There is not in the world again such a spring and seminary of brave military people as in England, Scotland, and Ireland. Bacon.

[The general idea involved in this word is that of return or repetition; as in these phrases—give it back again; give him as much again, that is, the same quantity once more or repeated, &c. There is an idiomatic use of the word in such phrases as, he struck it till it rung again, implying energy on the part of the subject or actor, and reciprocal action or return on that of the object.

He laughed till the glasses on the sideboard rang again. Dickens.]

—Again and again, often; with frequent repetition.

This is not to be obtained by one or two hasty readings; it must be repeated again and again. Locke.

Again (a-gān', a-gen'), prep. [O. E. and Sc.] 1. Against.

Through treason, again him wrought. Shakton.

2. Toward; in the direction to meet.

And praise him for to ride again the queene. Chaucer.

We hoped that he should have againbought Israel. Wickliffe.

Againrising (a-gān'ris-ing), n. Resurrection. 'The againrising of deeds men.' Wickliffe.

Againsaw (a-gān'sā), n. Contradiction.

Againsay (a-gen'sā), v. t. [Against for against, and say.] To gainsay. For extract see under AGAINSTAND.

Against (a-genst'), prep. [O. E. agenes, ayens, agayns, ongaynes, A. Sax. ā-gegnes, against. The es is an adverbial or genit. termination and the t does not properly belong to the word, having been added, like that in amidst, betwixt. The A. Sax. gegn, again or against, is only used in compounds; it is the same as gain in gainsay, heel. gegn, Sw. gen. G. gegen, against.] 1. Opposite in place; abreast; as, a ship is against the mouth of a river: in this sense it is often preceded by over.

2. In opposition to; in contrariety to; adverse or hostile to; as, twenty votes against ten; this change of measures is against us; against law, reason, or public opinion.

His hand will be against every man. Gen. xvi. 22.

3. Towards or upon; so as to meet; in an opposite direction to; as, to strike against a rock; the rain beats against the window; to ride against the wind.—4. Bearing or resting upon; as, to lean against a wall.—5. In provision for; in preparation for.

Against the day of my burying hath she kept this. Jn. xii. 7.

—Against time, as in the phrases, a match against time, a race against time, signifies that some specified things have to be done or distance run before the close of a given time.

I always felt as if I was riding a race against time. Dickens.]

Againststand (a-gen'stand), v. t. [Against for against, and stand.] To oppose; to withstand.

Agallochum (a-gal'lok-um), n. [Gr. agalochon. Origin unknown.] A name given to two kinds of fragrant wood largely used by the orientals as supplying a perfume. The agallochum of Cochin-China is obtained from Groezylon Agallochum, a leguminous tree growing in the mountainous regions of that country; while the Indian variety is the wood of Aquilaria Agallocha, a large tree inhabiting Silihet. Both woods abound in resin and an essential oil which yield the highly esteemed perfume used as incense in religious ceremonies. Agallochum is supposed by some to be the almyr-tree of Scripture. Called also Agal-wood, Eagle-wood, Lign-aloes, and Calambac.

Agalma (a-gal'ma), n. [Gr., an image.] In law, the impression or image of anything upon a seal.

Agalmatolite (a-gal-mat'ō-lit), n. [Gr. agalma, image, and lithos, stone.] A name given to a soft stone found in China and resembling statite. It is a clay-slate altered by heat, and by the addition of alkalies from the decomposition of jasper. It contains no magnesia, but otherwise has the characters of staurolite. It can be cut with the knife and polished; and in China is thus formed into works of art, as grotesque figures, pagodas, &c. Called also Figure-stone, Lord-stone, and Pagoda-stone.

Agal-wood (Agal-wud). [Usually corrupted to Agalo-wood.] See AGALLOCHUM.

Agaric (a-gar'ik), n. [Gr. agorion, a fungus used as tinder, from agros, according to Dioscorides, a town of Samaria, where this fungus abounded.] One of the fungi that form the genus Agaricus. By the old herbalists the name had a wider range, including the corky fungus growing on trunks of trees, like the 'female agaric' (Polyporus officinalis), to which the word was originally applied. See AGARICUS and POLYPORUS. — Agaric mineral, mountain-milk, or mountain-meal, one of the purest of the native carbonates of lime, found chiefly in the clefts of rocks and at the bottom of some lakes in a loose or semi-indurated form resembling a fungus. The name is also applied to a stone of loose consistence found in Tuscany, of which bricks may be made so light as to float in water, and of which the ancients are supposed to have made their floating bricks. It is a hydrated silicate of magnesium, mixed with lime, alumina, and a small quantity of iron.

Agaricia (a-ga-riah'-a), n. (From Agaricus, a genus of fungi.) The mushroom madrepora, a genus of coral madreporae, so named from their resemblance to mushrooms.

Agaricini (a-gar'ik-i-ni), n. pl. A group of fungi having the fruit-bearing surface arranged in radiating gills, as in the mushrooms and toad-stools.

Agaricus (a-gar'ik-us), n. [See AGARIC.] A large and important genus of fungi, characterized by having a fleshy cap or pileus, and a number of radiating plates or gills on means are used to produce striking varieties of colour in these stones. In Scotland also they are cut and polished, under the name of Scotch pebbles. They are used for rings, seals, cups, beads, boxes, handles of small utensils, &c. Agate is used by Shakespeare as a symbol of liveness or smallness, from the little figures cut in these stones when set in rings.

I was never married with an agate till now.

a Henry IV. act. i. sc. 2.

2. An instrument used by gold wire-drawers, so called from the agate in the middle of it. 3. Next the cap for the pivots of the compass-cards, so named because formed of a hard siliceous stone, a chalcedony or carnelian, &c.—4. In printing, a kind of type, called also Ruby (which see).

Agatized wood, a kind of hornstone formed by petrification.

Agaty (ag-at'i), a. Of the nature of agate.

An agaty flint. Woodward.

Agave (a-gá've), n. [Gr. agavos, noble.] A genus of plants, nat. order Amaryllidaceae, comprehending the American Aloe. The plants are generally large, and have a massive tuft of fleshy leaves with a spiny apex. They live for many years—ten to seventy—before flowering. When this takes place the tall flowering stem springs from the centre of the tuft of leaves, and grows very rapidly until it reaches a height of 15, 20, or even 40 feet, bearing towards the end a large number of flowers. The best-known species is A. americana, which was introduced into Europe in 1561. This yields many important products. The sap, obtained in abundance from the plant when the flowering stem is just ready to burst forth, produces, when fermented, a beverage resembling cider, called by the Mexicans pulque. The fibres of the leaves are formed into thread and ropes, and an extract of the leaves is used as a substitute for soap; the flower-stem, when withered, is cut up into slices to form razor-strops.

Agated (a-gá'ted), pp. or a. [This may be either a word independently formed from prefix a, on or at, and the noun agate, or, as simply another form of agate, aghat, Agami (Piphaia erythron).

Piphaia erythron, an interesting gallinular bird, family Gruidae, a native of South America, often called the golden-breasted trumpeter. It is of the size of a pheasant, runs with great speed, is easily tamed, and becomes as docile and attached to man as a dog.

Agamē (a-gam'ē), a. [Gr. agē, priv. and gamos, marriage.] In root applied to reproduction without the congress of individuals of the opposite sex, as by fission, budding, encystment, or parthenogenesis.

Agamidae (a-gam'i-dē), n. pl. [Agamē, the name of a lizard, and Gr. eidēs, resemblance.] A family of lacertilian reptiles, allied to the Iguanidae, characterized by the absence of palatal teeth, a depressed head, inflated skin, and by the caudal scales being imbricated. There are many genera found both in the Old and in the New World. See ICAUIDAE.

Agamist (ag-am'ist), n. [Gr. agē, priv. and gamos, marriage.] One who does not marry; one who refuses or rejects marriage. 'Agamists and wilful rejecters of matrimony.' Pope, Book of Marryage.

Agape (a-gá'pē), adv. or a. [Prefix a, on, and gape.] Gaping, as with wonder, expectation, or eager attention, having the mouth wide open.

There are not come to see this country show.

Which was the young agape. Yeoman Smith.

Agape (ag-a-pē), n. [Gr. agapē, love.] Among the primitive Christians a love-feast or feast of charity, held before or after the communion, when contributions were made for the poor. Such feasts were held at first without scandal, but afterwards being abused, they were condemned as the Council of Carthage, A.D. 397.

Agapomene (ag-a-pen'o-nē), n. [Gr. agapē, love, and menē, abode, from menō, to remain.] The abode of love; an association of men and which are produced the naked spores. The majority of this species are furnished with stems, but some are attached to the objects on which they grow by their pileus. Over a thousand species are known, and are arranged in five sections according as the colour of their spores is white, pink, brown, purple, or black. Many of the species are edible like the common mushroom (A. campestris), and supply a delicious article of food, while others are deleterious and even poisonous. See MUSHROOM.

Agast. See AGHAST.

Agastrie (a-gas'trik), a. [Gr. a, without, and gastro, gastric, belly.] Without a stomach or proper intestinal canal, as the tape-worm.

Agate (ag'at), n. [Fr. agate; L. achates, because found near a river of that name in Sicily.] 1. A siliceous semi-pellucid compound mineral, consisting of bands or layers of various colours blended together, the base generally being chalcedony, and this mixed with variable proportions of jasper, amethyst, quartz, opal, heliotrope, am. carnelian. The varying manner in which these materials are arranged causes the agate when polished to assume some characteristic appearance, and thus certain varieties are distinguished, as the ribbon agate, the fortification agate, the zone agate, the star agate, the moss agate, the clouded agate, &c. In some agates vegetable or animal remains have been observed imbedded. Agate is chiefly found in trap-rocks and serpentine, often in the form of nodules, called pebbles. Agates are esteemed the least valuable of the precious stones. They are cut and polished in large quantities at Oberstein in Saxony, where also artificial bling cider, called by the Mexicans pulque. The fibres of the leaves are formed into thread and ropes, and an extract of the leaves is used as a substitute for soap; the flower-stem, when withered, is cut up into slices to form razor-strops.

Agated (a-gá'ted), pp. or a. [This may be either a word independently formed from prefix a, on or at, and the noun agate, or, as simply another form of agate, aghat, modified by the influence and somewhat similar meaning of pace. See AGHAST.] Gazing with astonishment.

The French exclaimed the devil was in arms;

All the whole army stood agazed on him. Shak.

Age (ā), n. [Fr. âge; O. Fr. eage, and edage, age, through rustic or L.L. ætiatium, from L. ætas, ætiatē, an abbrev. of æviatē, from ævum, life-time, age, which word is really the same as the Gr. αἰών, life-time, eternity, and allied to æti, ever; Skr. ay, in dyus, life, and also to E. aye. Eternal is also from ævum.] 1. A period of time representing the whole or a part of the duration of any individual thing or being; the time during which an individual has existed or may exist; as, the age of a man; the age of a plant; the age of the world, or of a rock; my age is twenty years.

Jesus himself began to be about thirty years of age. Luke iii. 23.

2. The latter part of life or long-continued duration; the lapse of time, especially as affecting a person's physical powers; the state of being old; oldness.

The eyes of Israel were dim for age. Gen. xlviii. 10.

Age cannot wither her, nor custom stale Her infinite variety. Shak.

3. One of those periods or stages of development into which human life may be divided, as marked by certain characteristics; time of life; as, life is divided into four ages, infancy, youth, manhood, and old age.

All the world's a stage,
And all the men and women merely players;
They have their exits and their entrances,
And one man in his time plays many parts,
His acts being seven ages. Shak.

4. The state of having arrived at maturity; mature years; maturity.

He is of age, ask him. Jn. ix. 21.

5. Specifically, the completion of the first twenty-one years of one's life, at which time one is legally master of his actions; as, he is of age; to come of age; to be under age; also called full age, before which time a person is called an infant.

A male at twelve years old may take the oath of allegiance, at fourteen is at years of discretion, so far, at least, that he may enter into a binding marriage, or consent or disagree to one contracted before, and at twenty-one he is at his own disposal, and may alien his lands, goods, and chattels. . . . Full age in male or female is twenty-one years, which age is completed on the day preceding the twenty-first anniversary of a person's birth. Wharton.

6. A particular period of history, as distinguished from others; a historical epoch; as, the golden age; the age of heroes or of chivalry.

The age of chivalry is gone. Burke.
Intent on her, who rapt in glorious dreams,
The second-aid of some Astorian age,
Sat compass'd with professors. Tennyson.

The Homeric poems may be regarded by the student of history as great pictures of political and social life, illustrating the whole variety of Greek experience down to the close of that age, which saw the tides of Æolic, Ionic, and Dorian migration flow from the west to the east of the Ægean. Prof. Jebb.

The age is often used of the present as a historical period; the times we live in; as, to fully understand the spirit of the age. As regards the periods fancifully spoken of as the golden, the silver, and the iron age, see under these adjectives.—7. The people who live at a particular period; hence, a generation and a succession of generations; as, ages yet unborn. 'The mystery hid from ages.' Col. i. 26.—8. A century; the period of one hundred years.

Henry . . . justly and candidly apologizes for these five ages. Hallam.

9. Great length of time; protracted period; as, I haven't seen you for an age. 'Tomorrow, and that's an age away.' Tennyson.

10. Old people generally.

The hawthorn bush, with seats beneath the shade,
For talking age and whispering lovers made. Goldsmith.

—Age of the moon, the time elapsed since her last conjunction with the sun.—Geologic age, or period, one of those divisions or periods into which geologic time has been classified according to the prevalence of certain animal or vegetable forms, and the comparative antiquity or recentness of organic remains in the strata; as, the mesozoic age, the age of reptiles, &c.—The Archæological Ages or Periods are three—the Stone Age, the Bronze Age, and the Iron Age, these names being given in accordance with the materials employed for weapons, implements, &c., during the particular period. The Stone Age has been subdivided into two—the Paleolithic and Neolithic. (See these words.) The word age in this sense has no reference to the lapse of time, but simply denotes the stage at which a people has arrived in its progress towards civilization. There are tribes yet in their stone age. Neither do the more primitive implements necessarily disappear on the appearance of those of a more advanced stage, stone implements being yet to some extent employed in Britain. The phrase Stone Age, therefore, merely marks the period before the use of bronze, and Bronze Age that before the employment of iron, among any specific people.—SYN. Time, period, generation, date, era, epoch, maturity, ripeness.

Age (ā), v. i. To grow old; to assume the appearance of old age; as, he ages rapidly.

I am aging; that is, I have a whitish, or rather a light-coloured hair here and there. Lander.

Age (ā), v. t. To leave to the influence of time; to bring to maturity, or to a state fit for use; to give the character of age or ripeness to; as, to age wine; to age clay, &c.

Aged (ā'ed), a. 1. Old; having lived long; having lived almost the usual time allotted to that species of being; applied to animals or plants; as, an aged man, or an aged oak. 2. Having a certain age; having lived; as, a man aged forty years.

Agedly (ā'ed-ly), adv. Like an aged person.

Agedness (ā'ed-ness), n. The state or condition of being old; oldness.

Agend (ā-jend), n. [Contr. for L. agendum.] Something that is to be done; specifically in theol. a thing to be done, in contradistinction to a thing to be believed. See AGENDUM, 1.

For the matter of our worship, our credenda, our agenda are all according to the rule. Witcock.

Agendum (a-jen'dum), n. pl. Agenda (a-jen'da). [L., something to be done.] 1. In theol. something which a man is bound to perform, in opposition to credendum, or something which he is bound to believe. 'The moral and religious credenda and agenda of any good man.' Coleridge.—2. pl. (a) Memoranda a memorandum-book. (b) A church service; a ritual or liturgy.

Genesis (a-jen-'e-sis), n. (Gr. a, priv., and genesis, generation.) In physiol. any anomaly of organization, consisting in absence or imperfect development of parts.

Agent (ā-jent), a. [L. agens, agentis, acting. See ACT.] Acting; opposed to patient, or sustaining action. 'The body agent.' Bacon. [Rare.]

Agent (ā-jent), n. [See the adjective.] 1. An actor; one that exerts power, or has the power to act; as, a moral agent.—2. An active power or cause; that which has the power to produce an effect; as, heat is a powerful agent. In physics, anything which has power to act upon something else is an agent; in chem. substances which occasion the decomposition of others, or produce a chemical change on other bodies, are called agents; in med. anything which affects or tends to affect the human body is called an agent.—3. A substitute, deputy, or factor; one intrusted with the business of another; an attorney, solicitor, or other representative of a person, the person represented being called the principal in relation to his agent.—Morbific agents, in med. causes of disease; therapeutic agents, the means of treating disease.—A voluntary or free agent is one that may do or not do any action, and has the conscious perception that his actions result from the exercise of his own will.—Agent and patient, in law, a person who is both the doer of a thing and the party to whom it is done; thus when a person who owes money to another dies and makes the creditor his executor the latter may retain out of the estate as much as satisfies his claim, and is thus said to be agent and patient.

Agential (ā-jen'shal), a. Pertaining to an agent or agency.

Agglutinant (ag-glū-'tin-ant), a. Uniting as glue; tending to cause adhesion. 'Something strengthening and agglutinant.' Gray.

Agglutinate (ag-glū-'tin-āt), v. t. pret. & pp. agglutinated; ppr. agglutinating. [L. agglutino—ad, and glutino, from gluten, glue. See GLUTE.] To unite or cause to adhere, as with glue or other viscous substance; to unite by causing an adhesion of substances.

Agglutinate (ag-glū-'tin-āt), a. United as by glue; joined.—Agglutinate languages, languages in the second stage of development, or that midway between the monosyllabic and inflectional stages. The suffixes for inflection are glued to the root, but retain a kind of independence, and are felt to be distinct from the body of the word; the root stands at the head of the word and undergoes no modification, while the suffixes often undergo vowel modification by what has been called the law of harmony, every such ending having two forms, one with a heavy vowel and another with a light, these forms being employed in conformity with the character of the vowel in the root, thus, from Turk. baba, father, we have baba-lar-um-dan, from our fathers, but from dada, grandfather, dada-ler-in-den, from their grandfathers. Called also Agglutinative. Agglutinating, Polysynthetic, or Terminational Languages.

Agglutination (ag-glū'tin-ā'shon), n. 1. The act of uniting by glue or other tenacious substance; the state of being thus united; adhesion of parts. — 2. In philol. the most characteristic feature of the Turanian languages, consisting in a union of formative elements with roots in such a way that both retain a kind of semi-independence and the root is never obscured. See AGGLUTINATE, a.

In the Aryan languages the modifications of words, comprised under declension and conjugation, were likewise originally expressed by agglutination. But the component parts began soon to coalesce, so as to form one integral word, liable in its turn to phonetic corruption to such an extent that it became impossible after a time to decide which was the root and which the modificatory element. Max Müller.

Agglutinative (ag-glū'tin-āt-iv), a. 1. Tending or having power to agglutinate or unite; having power to cause adhesion; as, an agglutinative substance. — 2. In philol. exhibiting or characterized by the formative process known as agglutination; agglutinates; as, an agglutinative language.

There was a very good reason why the Turanian languages should have remained in this second or agglutinative stage. It was felt essential that the radical portion of each word should stand out in distinct relief and never be obscured or absorbed, as happens in the third or inflectional stage. Max Müller.

Aggrace (ag-grās'), v. t. 1. To show grace or favour to. Spenser. — 2. To make beautiful or graceful.

And that which all faire works doth most aggrace,

All (âl), v.t. To feel pain; to be in pain or trouble.

And much he ails, and yet he is not sick. Daniel. All (âl), n. Indisposition or morbid affection; ailment. Pope.

Allanthus, Alantus (â-lan-tus, â-lan'tus), n. [From alanto, the Malacca name for one species, signifying tree of heaven.] A genus of large timber-trees, nat. order Simarubaceae. A. glandulosus is a handsome tree of India and China, attaining a height of 60 feet. It is planted in France and Germany to shade public walks, and has been called false varnish-tree. The Bombay Cynthis, a species of silk-worms, feeds on its leaves. In Japan the produce of silk-worms fed on this tree is very large, and the material, though wanting the fineness and gloss of mulberry silk, is produced at far less cost, and is more durable.

Ailet (îl), n. Same as Aisle.

Aileron (âl'êr-on), n. Same as Ailette (which see).

Ailette, Aillette (âl-êf), n. [Fr.: a little wing.] One of the small square shields of arms worn upon the shoulders of knights during a part of the middle ages; the prototype of the modern epaulet. Called also Aileron.

Ailment (âl'ment), n. Disease; indisposition; morbid affection of the body; but the word is not applied ordinarily to acute diseases.

Allurus (âl'û-rus), n. [Gr. alourous, a cat.] A genus of carnivorous quadrupeds, family Ursidae. A. rufus, the only known species, is the panda (which see).

Aim (âm), v.t. [O.Fr. esmer, aesmer, to aim or level at, purpose, reckon; Fr. esmer, aesmer, adesmar, to reckon—L. ad, to, and astimare, to value, consider, reckon. See ESTEM.] 1. To direct a missile towards an object.—2. To point to in a figurative sense; to direct the mind to an object; specifically, (a) to guess; to conjecture.

In sadness, cousin, I do love a woman.—
I aimed so near, when I supposed you loved. Shak.

[Formerly common, but now rare in this sense.] (b) To direct the intention or purpose; to attempt to reach or accomplish; to tend toward; to endeavor; as, a man aims at distinction, or aims to be rich: in all its senses followed by at before the object where the object is expressed.—To cry aim, in archery, to encourage the archers by crying out aim when they were about to shoot. Hence it came to mean to applaud or encourage in a general sense.

It ill beseems this presence to cry aim
To these ill-tuned repetitions. Shak.

Aim (âm), v.t. To direct or point to a particular object; to level at; as, to aim a musket or an arrow, the fist or a blow; to aim a satire or a reflection at some person or vice.

Aim (âm), n. 1. The pointing or directing of a missile; the direction of anything to a particular point or object with a view to strike or affect it, as a spear, a blow, a discourse or remark.

Each at head levelled his deadly aim. Milton.

2. The direction in which a missile is pointed; the line of shot; hence, fig. the direction in which anything tends.

And when the cross blue lightning seem'd to open
The breast of heaven, I did present myself
Even in the aim and very flash of it. Shak.

3. The point intended to be hit, or object intended to be effected; the mark. 'To be the aim of every dangerous shot.' Shak.—4. A purpose; intention; design; scheme; as, men are often disappointed of their aim.

But see, how oft ambitious aims are crost. Pope.

5. Conjecture; guess.

He that seeth no mark, must shoot by aim. Sp. Tragedy.
It is impossible by aim to tell it. Spenser.

—To give aim, in archery, to stand near the butts to tell the archers where their arrows alight. The terms are 'wide on the shaft (right) hand; 'wide on the bow (left) hand; 'short'; 'gone'; the distances being measured by bow-lengths. See BOW-HAND.—SYN. End, object, scope, drift, design, purpose, intention, scheme.

Aim-crier (âm'kri-êr), n. 1. One who encouraged an archer by crying aim when he was about to shoot. Hence—2. An encourager generally; an approving on-looker; an abettor. 'Thou smiling aim-crier at princes' fall.' Markham.

Aimer (âm'êr), n. One that aims.

Aim-frontlet (âm'frunt-let), n. A piece of wood fitted to the muzzle of a gun so as to make it level with the breech, formerly in use among gunners. E. H. Knight.

Aimless (âm'les), a. Without aim; purposeless.

The Turks, half asleep, ran about in aimless confusion. Dryden.

Aimlessly (âm'les-ly), adv. Without aim; purposelessly.

Ain (ân), a. [See OWN.] Own. [Scotch.]

Ainca, Aines (âns), adv. Once. [Scotch.]

Ainent (ânent), a. [O.Fr. aner (the Mod.Fr. aller), to go, from L. adnare, originally to swim to;] In her. running; applied to beasts.

Ainsell (ân'sel), n. Ownself. [Scotch.]

Ain't, An't (ânt), a. A vulgar corruption of are not; sometimes also used for is not and am not.

Air (âr), n. [Fr. air, Pr. air, aire, L. aër, Gr. aër, air.] 1. The fluid which we breathe. Air is inodorous, invisible, insipid, colourless, elastic, possessed of gravity, easily moved, rarefied, and condensed, essential to respiration and combustion, and the medium of sounds.

Atmospheric air is composed by volume of 20 or 21 oxygen and 80 or 79 nitrogen; by weight, of 23 oxygen to 77 nitrogen. These gases are not chemically united, but mixed mechanically. Air contains also $\frac{1}{100}$ of carbonic acid, aqueous vapour, and varying proportions of ammonia, nitric acid, ozone, and organic matter. The body of air surrounding the earth is called the atmosphere. The specific gravity of the air is to that of water nearly as 1 to 823, and 1000 cubic inches at mean temperature and pressure weigh 304 grains. Air is necessary to life; being inhaled into the lungs, the oxygen is separated from the nitrogen, and it is supposed to furnish the body with heat and animation. By the ancient philosophers air was considered one of the four elements.—2. In chem. same as Gas; thus oxygen was called dephlogisticated air.—3. Air in motion; a light breeze. 'The summer airs blow cool.' Tennyson.—4. Utterance abroad; publication; publicity.

You gave it air before me. Dryden.

Wind is used in like manner. Hence—5. Intelligence; information; advice.

It grew from the airs; which the princes and states abroad received from their ambassadors and agents here. Bacon.

6. In music, (a) a tune; a short song or piece of music adapted to words; also, the peculiar modulation of the notes which gives music its character; melody; as, a soft air. (b) A song or piece of poetry for singing; as, the air, 'Sound an Alarm.' (c) The soprano part in a harmonized piece of music.—7. Any piece of poetry. 'The repeated air of sad Electra's poet.' Milton. [Rare.]—8. The peculiar look, appearance, and bearing of a person; as, the air of a youth; a graceful air; a lofty air.—9. The general character or complexion of anything; appearance; semblance.

Too great liberties taken (in translation) in varying either the expression or composition, in order to give a new air to the whole, will be apt to have a very bad effect. Bp. Leitch.

As it was communicated with the air of a secret, it soon found its way into the world. Pope.

10. pl. An affected manner; manifestation of pride or vanity; assumed haughtiness; chiefly in the phrase to give one's self airs.

Mrs. Crackenbury read the paragraph in bitterness of spirit, and discomfited to her followers about the airs which that woman was giving herself. Thackeray.

11. pl. The artificial motions or carriage of a horse.—12. In painting, (a) that which expresses action; manner; gesture; attitude. (b) The representation of the effect of the atmospheric medium, through which natural objects are viewed.—To take the air, to go abroad; to walk or ride a little distance.—To take air, to be divulged; to be made public; as, the story has taken air. Air is frequently found in composition, and as the compounds are in many cases words of obvious meaning, only those which have a peculiar or specific sense are entered below in alphabetical order.

Air (âr), v.t. 1. To expose to the air; to give access to the open air; to ventilate; as, to air clothes; to air a room. Hence—2. To expose ostentatiously; to display; to bring before public notice; as, to air one's views. 'Airing a snowy hand and signet ring.' Tennyson.—3. To expose to heat; to warm; as, to air linen; to air liquors.

Air, Ear (âr), a. and adv. Early. [Scotch.] 'An air winter's a sair winter.' Scotch proverb.

Aira (âra), n. [Greek name of a kind of dandelion.] Hair-grass, a genus belonging to the nat. order Gramineæ, characterized by two-flowered spikelets. The species are widely distributed in temperate regions, but few are of much value as fodder plants. A. caespitosa (the tufted hair-grass) is from 2 to 4 feet high, growing in meadows and boggy heaths, where its tufts are useful as stepping-places. It affords a fine cover for game, and constitutes the bulk of bog-hay on moors. Its long, narrow, rough leaves wound the skin if drawn smartly across it.

Airable (âr-a-bl), a. Suitable to be sung. Howell. [Rare and obsolete.]

Air-balloon (âr-bal-lôn), n. See BALLOON.

Air-bath (âr'bath), n. 1. The exposure of the person to the action of the air, recommended by Dr. Franklin.—2. An arrangement for drying substances by exposing them to air of any temperature desired.

Air-bed (âr'bed), n. A bed made by inflating an air-tight bed-shaped bag with air.

Air-bladder (âr'blad-dêr), a. 1. A vesicle filled with air.

The pulmonary artery and vein pass along the surfaces of these air-bladders in an infinite number of ramifications. Arbutnot.

2. A bag situated under the back-bone of certain fishes, and which, being full of air, is supposed to assist in breathing, and in regulating the buoyancy of the animal.

Air-bone (âr'bôn), n. A bone with a large cavity filled with air, as in birds. Owen.

Air-brake (âr'brâk), n. A railway brake applied by means of condensed atmospheric air.

Air-braving (âr'brâv-ing), a. Defying the influence of the air. 'Air-braving towers.' Shak.

Air-brick (âr'brik), n. An iron box, commonly made of the size and shape of a brick, and perforated with holes, placed in the walls of houses as to facilitate the transmission of air, and thus promote ventilation.

Air-built (Ar'bilt), a. Breasted to the air; having no solid foundation, chimney; as, an air-built castle, air-built hopes.

Air-boat (Ar'boit), a. An air-gun fitted up in a walking-stick.

Air-casing (Ar'kasing), a. An air-tight casing of sheet-iron around a pipe to prevent undue transmission of heat or cold, especially the casing round the base of the funnel of a steam-vessel, to prevent too great a transmission of heat to the deck.

Air-cell (Ar'sel), n. In bot. one of the cavities in the leaves, stems, or other parts of plants, containing air. They are well seen in the blades of sea-weeds, and are found in other aquatic plants, which they serve to float. Called also Air-chamber. — 1 Is sent (a) the minute bronchial cells constituting the texture of the lungs, into which the air is conveyed by the ultimate ramifications of the windpipe, for the oxygenation of the blood, (b) the dilatations of the trachea or air tube in insects forming the respiratory apparatus.

Air-cells in Cell-weed (Codium) (enlarged).

Air-chamber (Ar'cham), n. 1 Air-cell (which see). — 2 A cavity in a hydraulic machine, such as a fire-engine, the air in which, on being compressed by the admission of water into the chamber, by its elastic force acts as a spring, and equalizes the flow of the liquid.

Air-condenser (Ar'kon-dens'er), a. An apparatus for condensing air. It consists of a glass vessel with a syringe attached to it, which is used for injecting air into the vessel until the requisite degree of condensation be produced.

Air-cool (Ar'kon), a. A cone in a marine-engine to receive the gases which enter the hot-well from the air-pump, whence, after ascending, they escape through a pipe at the top.

Air-current (Ar'kura), a. A general name for the passages in a coal-mine intended for ventilation.

Air-cushion (Ar'kush-on), a. A cushion made by inflating a bag with air.

Air-draw (Ar'dro), a. Manna. [Hara.]

Air-drain (Ar'drain), a. A cavity formed round the external walls of a building to prevent the earth from lying against them and causing dampness.

Air-drawn (Ar'dran), a. Drawn or depicted in the air. The air-drawn dagger. [Shak.]

Air-drill (Ar'dril), a. A drill driven by the pressure of condensed air. E. H. Knight.

Air-engine (Ar'en-jin), a. An engine in which air, heated or compressed, is employed as the motive power. Condensed air engines have been found to be the best and safest for working the rock-drill in mining operations, the waste air serving to ventilate the mine and reduce the oppressive heat.

Air (Ar), n. 1. One who airs, or exposes to the air. — 2. A current for drying clothes, &c.

Air-escape (Ar'en-kap), a. A contrivance for permitting air which has collected in water pipes to escape.

Air-exhauster (Ar'eks-hast'er), n. 1. An air-trap by which collected air may escape from water-mains, &c. — 2. A contrivance for removing exhausted air from any place intended to be ventilated.

Air-filter (Ar'il-ter), a. A contrivance for filtering or purifying air. The common method is to make the air pass through a wire screen, and then expose the current to the action of water.

Air-fountain (Ar'foun-tan), a. An apparatus for producing a jet of water by the elastic force of air compressed in a glass vessel, and made to act on the surface of the water to be raised.

Air-funnel (Ar'fun-nel), a. A vessel a cavity formed by the condensation of a timber in the upper parts of a vessel, to promote the ventilation of the hold.

Air-furnace (Ar'fir-nas), a. A term used to denote a furnace which has no blast, but only a natural draught.

Air-gas (Ar'gas), a. An inflammable illuminating gas made by charging ordinary atmospheric air with the vapours of petroleum, naphtha, or some similar substance. The substance so used is called gasoline, and must be such as to evaporate with great readiness. It is placed in a vessel called a generator, where it is exposed to a current of air, and various contrivances are adopted to promote the evaporation, and prevent the too rapid cooling which the evaporation is liable to bring about.

Air-grating (Ar'grat-ing), a. A grating to admit air for ventilation.

Air-gun (Ar'gun), a. A kind of gun in which highly-condensed air is used to project the ball. A common variety is shaped like a rifle or musket, a hollow spherical ball, into which air has been forced by a condensing syringe, being attached to it and serving as a reservoir for the condensed air. A portion of this air escapes into the barrel, by the opening of a valve, each time the trigger is drawn, so that it presses against the ball precisely in the same way as gunpowder. Air condensed to $\frac{1}{16}$ of its bulk gives about half the velocity of gunpowder.

Air-holder (Ar'hoid-er), a. 1. A vessel for holding air for various purposes, as (a) for the purpose of counteracting the pressure of a descending column of mercury, (b) for the purpose of keeping up a moderate and steady current of air. In the latter case the air is contained in an inverted vessel which rises and falls in a tank of water, and has the air supplied to it by one pipe and carried off by another. — 2. A gasometer.

Air-hole (Ar'höl), a. 1. An opening to admit or discharge air. — 2. In foundry, a fault in a casting, caused by a bubble of air passing from a core outwards, and which is retained in the metal. Called also a Blow-hole.

Airily (Ar'i-li), adv. In an airy manner, gaily.

Fanny bids her father good-night, and whistles airily. [Dickens.]

Airiness (Ar'i-nas), a. 1. Exposure to a free current of air; openness to the air, as, the airiness of a country-seat. — 2. Coquetry; levity; as, the airiness of young persons. 'A certain talkativeness and airiness in their (the French) tongue.' [Stowe.]

Airing (Ar'ing), a. 1. An exposure to the air, or to a fire, for warming or drying. — 2. Exercise in the open air; a short excursion.

Airing-stage (Ar'ing-staj), a. A platform on which powder is dried by exposure to sun and air.

Air-jacket (Ar'jak-et), a. A jacket inflated with air, or to which bladders filled with air are fastened to render persons buoyant in water.

Airless (Ar'les), a. Not open to a free current of air, wanting fresh air or communication with open air.

Air-level (Ar'lev-el), a. A name sometimes given to a spirit-level (which see).

Airings (Ar'ing), a. A thoughtless, gay person.

Light airings will be won with dogs and hares. [Johnson.]

Air-lock (Ar'lok), a. An air-tight chamber in a caisson in which operations are being carried on under water, communicating by one door with the outer air and the main entrance shaft of the caisson, and by another door with the chambers filled with condensed air in which the men are at work. Before entering the latter chambers one must pass through the air-lock, where one remains until the air within it has been brought to the same degree of compression as that in the working chambers.

Air-machine (Ar'ma-shin), a. In mining, the apparatus by which pure air is forced into parts badly ventilated, and the foul air extracted.

Airn (Arn), a. Iron. [Scotch.]

Airo-hydrogen (Ar'o-hi'dro-jen), a. Pertaining to a mixture of atmospheric air and hydrogen. — Airo-Aydrogen blow-pipe, a blow-pipe in which atmospheric air and hydrogen are burned together in order to produce an intense heat.

Airometer (Ar-on-oi-ter), a. [Air, and Gr. metron, a measure.] Same as Air-holder (b).

Air-passage (Ar'pas-ij), n. 1. In anat. one of the tubes by which air is admitted to the lungs, comprising the larynx, trachea, bronchial tubes, and their minute ramifications. 2. In bot. a large intercellular space in the stems and leaves of aquatic plants, and in the stems of endogens.

Air-pipe (Ar'pip), a. A pipe used to draw foul air out of, or conduct fresh air into close places. Specifically, (a) a pipe used to draw foul air from a ship's hold by means of a communication with the furnace, and the rarefaction of the air by the fire. This pipe is intended to supply the combustion with the air of the hold, by preventing the access of other air to the fire. (b) In mining, a pipe or tube made of wood or iron, for conducting or conveying fresh air into levels having but one communication with the atmosphere.

Air-plant (Ar'plant), a. 1. A general name for the orchids belonging to the genus Aerides (which see). — 2. A general term applied to epiphytes which derive all their food from the atmosphere. See EPHYTES.

Air-point (Ar'poit), a. An instrument to measure the weight of the air.

Air-port (Ar'port), a. A name given to large scuttles in ships' bows for the admission of air when the other ports are down. The Americans call their side-ports also by this name.

Air-pump (Ar'pump), a. A most valuable pneumatic machine, for the purpose of exhausting the air from a closed vessel called a receiver, and thereby producing what is called a vacuum, which, however, is only partial. It was invented by Otto Guericke in 1654, but has since been much improved. The air-pump acts by the elastic force of air, and gradually exhausts the air from the receiver by means of a piston, with a proper valve, working in a cylindrical barrel or tube, somewhat after the manner of a common water-pump, each successive stroke withdraws the air more and more, a barometer gauge showing the extent of the rarefaction. The exhaustion is limited by the elasticity of the remaining air being no longer capable of opening the valve. Air-pumps are variously constructed; the most common forms have two barrels and two pistons wrought by a toothed wheel, as that represented in the annexed cut. See VACUUM. — The air-pump of a steam-engine is the pump by which the condensing water and condensed steam are drawn off from the condenser. It is an appendage of every condensing engine, but is not, of course, requisite in high-pressure or non-condensing engines. See STRAIN-ENGINE. — Air-pump bucket, an open piston with valves on the upper surface opening upwards so as to admit the air and water in the down-stroke, and lift it with the up-stroke of the pump.

Air-sac (Ar'sak), n. In physics, one of the membranous bags or receptacles of air lodged in the hollow bones, the cavities of the body, and the gills of birds, and communicating with the lungs. They enlarge the respiratory surface, accelerate circulation, and thus increase muscular energy. They are also supposed to render the body specifically lighter, and to supply the place of a muscular diaphragm.

Air-scuttle (Ar'skut-l), a. Same as Air-port. — Air-shaft (Ar'shaft), a. A passage for air into a mine, usually opening in a perpendicular direction, and meeting the adits or horizontal passages, and so causing a free circulation of fresh air through the mine.

Air-slacked (Ar'slakt), a. Slacked or pulverized by the action of air, or of the moisture in the atmosphere; as, air-slacked lime.

Air-stove (Ar'stov), a. A stove which is employed to heat a current of air directed against its surface by means of pipes, which limited air is then admitted to the apartment requiring to be heated.

basilica pontificia, is phat the name given to a collection positive in which the film, after being coloured with dry pigments, is rendered permeable to various, and thus shows the colour in the collodion itself.

Alabaster (al-a-las'tri), n. [L. alabastrum, alabaster. See ALABASTER.] 1. A name sometimes given to alabaster. Hence—2. A vase, box, or other vessel formed of alabaster.

Alabaster (al-a-las'tri), n. Same as alabaster.

Alabaster (al-a-las'tri), n. [L. alabastrum, alabaster.] A name given to a flower-bird. It was originally applied to the rose-bird. Written also alabastrum.

Alack (a-lak'), interj. [Probably a form of alas.] An exclamation expressive of sorrow. Alack! when once our grace we have forgot. Shak.

Alackaday (a-lak-a-day), interj. [Alas-the-day (Comp. Woe-a-day).] An exclamation uttered to express regret or sorrow. Written also Alack-the-day. [Obscure.]

Alack-the-day! I pray you tell me in my boy time or death. Shak.

Alacry (a-lak'-ri), v. t. [L. alacer, alacry, cheerful, and facio, to make.] To make cheerful, to rouse to action, to excite.

Alacryous (a-lak'-ri-us), a. Cheerful, lively. There were if we were a little more alacryous and exact in the performance of the day. Hammond

Alacryously (a-lak'-ri-us-ly), adv. Cheerfully. Alacryousness (a-lak'-ri-us-ness), n. British. 'To infuse some life, some alacryousness into you.' Hammond

Alacry (a-lak'-ri), n. [L. alacris, from alacer, alacry, cheerful.] Cheerfulness; gaiety, sprightliness, more usually, a cheerful readiness or promptitude to do some act, cheerful willingness, as, the soldiers advanced with alacry to meet the enemy. I have not that alacry of spirits. Hamlet

Alacry (a-lak'-ri), n. [L. alacris, from alacer, alacry, cheerful.] Cheerfulness; gaiety, sprightliness, more usually, a cheerful readiness or promptitude to do some act, cheerful willingness, as, the soldiers advanced with alacry to meet the enemy. I have not that alacry of spirits. Hamlet

Alacry (a-lak'-ri), n. [L. alacris, from alacer, alacry, cheerful.] Cheerfulness; gaiety, sprightliness, more usually, a cheerful readiness or promptitude to do some act, cheerful willingness, as, the soldiers advanced with alacry to meet the enemy. I have not that alacry of spirits. Hamlet

Alacry (a-lak'-ri), n. [L. alacris, from alacer, alacry, cheerful.] Cheerfulness; gaiety, sprightliness, more usually, a cheerful readiness or promptitude to do some act, cheerful willingness, as, the soldiers advanced with alacry to meet the enemy. I have not that alacry of spirits. Hamlet

Alacry (a-lak'-ri), n. [L. alacris, from alacer, alacry, cheerful.] Cheerfulness; gaiety, sprightliness, more usually, a cheerful readiness or promptitude to do some act, cheerful willingness, as, the soldiers advanced with alacry to meet the enemy. I have not that alacry of spirits. Hamlet

Alacry (a-lak'-ri), n. [L. alacris, from alacer, alacry, cheerful.] Cheerfulness; gaiety, sprightliness, more usually, a cheerful readiness or promptitude to do some act, cheerful willingness, as, the soldiers advanced with alacry to meet the enemy. I have not that alacry of spirits. Hamlet

Alacry (a-lak'-ri), n. [L. alacris, from alacer, alacry, cheerful.] Cheerfulness; gaiety, sprightliness, more usually, a cheerful readiness or promptitude to do some act, cheerful willingness, as, the soldiers advanced with alacry to meet the enemy. I have not that alacry of spirits. Hamlet

Alacry (a-lak'-ri), n. [L. alacris, from alacer, alacry, cheerful.] Cheerfulness; gaiety, sprightliness, more usually, a cheerful readiness or promptitude to do some act, cheerful willingness, as, the soldiers advanced with alacry to meet the enemy. I have not that alacry of spirits. Hamlet

Alacry (a-lak'-ri), n. [L. alacris, from alacer, alacry, cheerful.] Cheerfulness; gaiety, sprightliness, more usually, a cheerful readiness or promptitude to do some act, cheerful willingness, as, the soldiers advanced with alacry to meet the enemy. I have not that alacry of spirits. Hamlet

Alacry (a-lak'-ri), n. [L. alacris, from alacer, alacry, cheerful.] Cheerfulness; gaiety, sprightliness, more usually, a cheerful readiness or promptitude to do some act, cheerful willingness, as, the soldiers advanced with alacry to meet the enemy. I have not that alacry of spirits. Hamlet

Alacry (a-lak'-ri), n. [L. alacris, from alacer, alacry, cheerful.] Cheerfulness; gaiety, sprightliness, more usually, a cheerful readiness or promptitude to do some act, cheerful willingness, as, the soldiers advanced with alacry to meet the enemy. I have not that alacry of spirits. Hamlet

Albumen (al-bū'men) n. [L. from albus, white.] 1. In physiol. a substance so named from the Latin for the white of an egg, in which it abounds in its purest natural state, serving as the type of the protein compounds or the nitrogenous class of food stuffs. It is a proximate principle, entering largely into the composition of the animal and vegetable fluids and solids, is coagulable by heat at and above 180°, and is composed of carbon, hydrogen, nitrogen, and oxygen, with a little sulphur. It abounds in the serum of the blood, the vitreous and crystalline humours of the eye, the fluid of dropsy, the substance called coagulable lymph, in nutritive matters, the juice of flesh, &c. The blood contains about 7 per cent. of albumen. It is the starting point of all the tissues. Vegetable albumen exists in most vegetable juices and many seeds, and has the same composition and properties as animal. Albumen is used to clarify syrups, liquors, and to fix colours in printing. In cookery white of egg is employed for clarifying, but in large operations like sugar refining the serum of blood is used. With lime it forms a cement to masonry broken ware. In bot. the name is applied to the farinaceous matter which surrounds the embryo. It constitutes the meat of the corns not, the flour or meal of cereals, the roasted part of coffee, &c. Albumen exists either as soluble or as insoluble albumen. The former variety is converted into the latter by the action of heat.

Alexandrian (al-egs-an'dri-an), n. Pertaining to Alexandria. Often applied as an attribute to, or used as a noun for, one who professed or taught in connection with Alexandria, in Egypt.—Alexandrian Codex, an important manuscript of the Scriptures, in the British Museum, written on parchment in uncial characters. Its probable date is the fifth or sixth century.—Alexandrian Library, the largest collection of books of the ancient world, founded by Ptolemy Soter at Alexandria, in Egypt, and said to have contained 700,000 volumes of the literature of Rome, Greece, and Egypt. Supposed to have been ultimately destroyed by fanatic Arabs A. D. 641.

Alexandrine (al-egs-an'drin), n. 1. A kind of verse consisting of twelve syllables in English poetry, or in French of twelve and thirteen in alternate couplets, and properly having the pause or break at the end of the third foot: so called from a poem written in French on the life of Alexander the Great. French tragedies are generally composed in Alexandrines. The last line of the following extract is an example.

A weeping Alexandrine ends the song
That like a wounded snake drops on slow length along.

2. The name of several ancient medical preparations, especially a garlic plaster invented by an ancient physician of the name of Alexander. Duglison.

Alexandrite (al-egs-an'drit), n. [After Alexander I., emperor of Russia.] A variety of chrysoberyl found in the mica-slate of the Urala.

Alexipharmaceutical (a-lēk'ā'fīrm'ē-tāl), n. Same as Alexipharmaca. Deane Pierce.

Alexipharmic, Alexipharmical (a-lēk'ā'fīrm'īk, a-lēk'ā'fīrm'īk-āl), n. [Or alexo, to ward off, pharmakon, a drug, remedy, poison.] 1. Acting as a means of warding off disease, acting as a remedy.—2. Having the power of warding off the effects of poison, acting as an antidote, antidotal.

Some antidotal quality it may have, since not only the bone is the heart, but the bone of a deer is alexipharmic. Sir T. Browne.

Alexipharmic (a-lēk'ā'fīrm'īk), n. 1. A medicine, a remedy.

Finding his strength every day less, he was at last terrified, and called for help upon the magus of physics: they filled his apartments with alexipharmics, restoratives, and oriental vires.

2. An antidote to poison or infection.

Alexiteric, Alexiterical (a-lēk'ī-tēr'īk, a-lēk'ī-tēr'īk-āl), n. [Or alexo, to ward off, and dīstērion, poison.] Resisting poison; obviating the effects of venom.

Alexiteric (a-lēk'ī-tēr'īk), n. A medicine to resist the effects of poison or the bite of venomous animals.

Ale-yard (ā'lē-yārd), n. A very elongated form of drinking-glass and measure for ale formerly used. There were also half-yards and quarter-yards, for pints and half-pints respectively. A 'tricky' ale-yard was also used, in which the narrow end opened into a small globe, so contrived that, in the process of draining, the ale came out on the drinker's face with a spurt.

Aifa, Aifa-grass (ā'fā, ā'fā-grās), n. A North African name for Macrochloa avaricaria and its fibre, one of the varieties of esparto.

Aifet (ā'fēt), n. [L. L. aifetum, from A. Sax. aifast, a pot to boil in—er, fire, and fast, a vat.] A vessel of boiling water into which an accused person plunged his arm as a test of his innocence or guilt.

Al fresco (ā'lē-frēskō), n. [It.] In the open air, cool.

Alga (ā'gā), n. [L.] A sea-weed; one of the algae.

Algae (ā'gē), n. pl. A nat. order of cryptogamic or thallogeous plants found for the most part in the sea and fresh water, comprising sea-weeds. The higher forms have stems bearing leaf-like expansions, and they are often attached to the rocks by roots which, however, do not take food from the rocks. The stem is most frequently absent, and the plant consists of the foliar expansion.

1. Diatoma albidulum, a. Spore. b. Vertical view of a spore. c. Vertical section of a spore. 2. Placodium carolinense, f. Tetraspore. g. Dictyonema, a. Branchlet with a tubercle.

of one or more cells. They are nourished through their whole surface by the medium in which they live. The species vary in size from the microscopic diatoms to forms whose trunks exceed those of forest trees, and whose fronds rival the leaves of the palm. They are entirely composed of cellular tissue, and many are edible and nutritious, as carrageen or Irish-moss, dulce, &c. Kelp, iodine, and bromine are products of various species. The algae are also valuable as manure.

Algal (ā'gāl), n. One of the algae (which see).

Algal (ā'gāl), n. Of or pertaining to the algae, having the nature of the algae.

Alga-roba (ā'gā-rōbā), n. [Ar.] 1. The Arabic name of a tree, Ceratonia Siliqua. See CERATONIA.—2. The name in Panama for the tree Hymenocle Courbardi. See HYMENOCLE.

Algarot, Algaroth (ā'gā-rōt, ā'gā-rōth), n. [From the name of the inventor, Algaroth, a celebrated physician of Verona.] A violently purgative and emetic white powder, which fails when chloride of antimony is Alkaline (al'ka-lin), a. Having the properties of an alkali — Alkaline earths, lime, magnesia, barytes, strontia. See ALKALI. — Alkaline development, in photog. the development of collodionized sensitive plates by an alkali, or an alkaline salt, combined with pyrogallie acid. To insure success all salts of silver soluble in water must be absent, otherwise the picture is foggy.

Alkalinity (al-ka-lin'i-ti), n. The state of being alkaline; the quality which constitutes an alkali.

Alkalious (al-kā'lī-us), a. Having the properties of alkali. [Rare.]

Alkalize (al'kal-iz-āt or al-ka'līz-āt), v. t. To make bodies alkaline. [Rare.] See ALKALIZE.

Alkalization (al'ka-liz-ā'shon), n. The act or process of rendering alkaline by impregnating with an alkali.

Alkalize (al'ka-liz), v. t. pret. & pp. alkalized; ppr. alkalizing. To make alkaline; to communicate the properties of an alkali to; to alkaliify.

Alkaloid (al'ka-loid), n. [From alkali, and Gr. eidos, likeness.] A term applied to a class of nitrogenized compounds found in living plants, and containing their active principles, usually in combination with organic acids. They generally end in in or ine, as morphine, quinine, aconitine, caffeine, &c. Most alkaloids occur in plants, but some are formed by decomposition. Their alkaline character depends on the nitrogen they contain. Most natural alkaloids contain carbon, hydrogen, nitrogen, and oxygen, but the greater number of artificial ones want the oxygen. The only property common to all alkaloids is that of combining with acids to form salts, and some exhibit an alkaline reaction with colours. Alkaloids form what is termed the organic bases of plants. Although formed originally within the plant, it has been found possible to prepare several of these alkaloids by purely artificial means.

Alkaloid (al'ka-loid), a. Relating to or containing alkali.

Alkanet (al'ka-net), n. [Sp. alcaneta, dim. of alcana, alcanna, from Ar. al-hinna, henna.] A boraginaceous plant, Alkanna (Anchusa of some writers) finetoria. The root is used to impart a deep red colour to oily substances, ointments, plasters, &c. It is sometimes employed in the adulteration of port-wine.

Alkanna (al-kan'na), n. [Ar. al-hinna, henna.] 1. A genus of Mediterranean and oriental plants, nat. order Boraginaceae, closely allied to Lithospermum and Anchusa, in which latter genus it is included by some botanists. It differs from Lithospermum only in having the four small nuts which form its fruit contracted at the base, and from Anchusa in not having the nuts excavated at the base, and in having no scales closing the mouth of the corolla. Alkanet (which see) belongs to this genus. 2. Henna.

Alkarsine (al-kār'sin), n. An extremely poisonous liquid containing kakodyle, together with oxidation products of this substance, and formerly known as Cadet's fuming liquor, characterized by its insupportable smell and high degree of spontaneous combustibility when exposed to air. From this latter quality and the poisonous fumes which it evolves it has been proposed to employ it as a deadly agent in war. A shell filled with it would, in bursting, it is said, involve a ship in fire and destroy the crew by its vapour. See KAKODYLE.

Alkebengi (al-kē-ken'ji), n. [Ar. al-kubeny, a kind of resin obtained near Herat.] The winter-cherry, a solanaceous plant called Physalis Alkebengi. The scarlet fruit inclosed in the enlarged red calyx makes the plant very ornamental in the beginning of winter. The fruit is edible, and has a slightly acid taste.

Alkenna, Alhenna (al-ken'na, al-hen'na), n. Same as Henna.

Alkermes (al-kēr'mēs), n. [Ar. See KERMES.] The name of a once celebrated compound cordial, to which a fine red colour was given by kermes. Its ingredients are said to have been cider, rose-water, sugar, and various fragrant flavouring matters.

Alkohol (al'kō-hoi). Same as Alcohol.

Alkoholik (al'kō-hoi'ik), a. Same as Alcoholic.

Alkoran (al'kō-ran or al-kō-rān'), n. [Ar. al, the, and korān, reading, book, from qārā, to read, to teach; the Book by way of eminence, as we say the Bible (Gr. biblos, a book).] The book which contains the religious and moral code of the Mohammedans, and by which indeed all their transactions, civil, legal, military, &c., are regulated; the Koran. It was written by Mohammed, and is considered to present the purest specimen of the classical Arabic, which, however, is very different from the spoken Arabic of modern times.

Alkoran, Alcoran (al'kō-rān'), n. A high tower on Persian buildings.

Alkoranish (al-kō-rān'ish or al-kō-rān'ish'), a. Pertaining to the Koran or Alkoran, or to Mohammedanism.

Alkoranist (al-kō-rān'ist or al-kō-rān'ist'), n. One who adheres strictly to the letter of the Koran, rejecting all comments. The Persians are generally Alkoranists; the Turks, Arabs, and Tartars admit a multitude of traditions.

All (al), a. [A Sax. eal, eall, al, Icel. allr, Goth. alls, G. all, all. Common to all the Teutonic tongues. Grimm is inclined to regard all as identical with W. oll, Armor. holi, Gr. holos, Ocean sollus, L. solutus, Skr. sarva, all, whole. In this view all would be the same word as E. safe, from Fr. sauve, and that from L. solutus.] 1. Every one of; the whole number of, with reference to individuals or particulars, taken collectively; as, all men, all the men. — 2. The whole quantity of, with reference to extent, duration, amount, quality, or degree; as, all the wheat; all the land; all the year; all the strength; in all probability; to all appearance. — 3. It was sometimes used formerly for any. 'Without all doubt' (that is, without any particle of doubt). Shak.

In like manner shak thou do with his ass; and so shak thou do with his raiment; and with all lost thing of thy brother's. Deut. xxii. 3.

4. Only; alone. 'Thou art all my child' (my only child). Shak. This, however, may be the use of the word in the extract quoted after ALL, adv., 3. When joined to nouns accompanied by the definite article or a possessive or demonstrative pronoun, the article or pronoun comes between it and the noun; as, all my labour; all his goods; all these things. In all day, all night, all the summer, &c., all means during the whole, and the phrases are a kind of adverbial accusatives. The article is generally omitted before day and night, though sometimes inserted as more emphatic.

We will sing to you all the day. Tennyson.

[The definite article is for the most part omitted in Shakspeare both before day and night; in the authorized version of the Bible it is in the great majority of cases supplied before day and omitted before night.] — Such phrases as two (or twos) all, three all, six all, are used in certain games to signify that all the players are equal, and they are used even when there are no more than two persons or sides engaged in the game. — For all, an elliptical expression, meaning (a) for all times; for all occasions in the future. 'Learn now for all . . . I care not for you.' Shak. [Now used only in the phrase once for all. See FOR, 1.] (b) For all the fact that; notwithstanding; although. 'For all you are my man.' Shak. See FOR, 21. All is sometimes found redundantly in the phrase all the whole.

But all the whole inheritance I give. Shak.

See another example in extract under AGAZED.

All (al), adv. 1. Wholly; completely; entirely; altogether; quite; as, all bedewed; my friend is all for amusement; it is all gone.

He rode all unarmed, and he rode all alone. Scott.

In such antique uses (chiefly ballad) as, 'he thought them sixpence all too dear', all appears to retain its appropriate sense, though in some cases it is nearly pleonastic, or serves only to add a little force to the expression. 'When all about the wind doth blow.' Shak.

A damsel lay deploring All on a rock reclined. Gay.

Perhaps we may also class here such usages as where the all seems to draw attention more strongly to a period of time; as, 'All in the mornynge tyde'; 'All in the month of May.' Comp. all as below. In the following passage—

And a certain woman cast a piece of a millstone upon Abimelech's head and all to brake his skull. Judg. ix. 53.

all is an adverb equivalent to altogether, while the to belongs to the verb following, being commonly used as an intensive prefix to verbs by writers of the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth centuries; thus, 'he to-brac the rock.' Wickiife. Pa. cv. 41, which in the common version stands 'he opened the rock.' — 2. Although; as, 'all were it as the rest.' Spenser. — 3. Only; exclusively. 'I shall never marry like my sisters to love my father all.' Shak. — All as, (a) when; as; just when. 'All as his straying flocks he fed.' Spenser. [Obsolete or poetical.]

He their courtesy to requite,
Gave them a chain of twelve marks weight,
All as he lighted down. Sir W. Scott.

(b) As if.

The knee cold blows through my beaten hide,
All as I were through the body gryde. Spenser.

— All but, nearly; almost; not quite; as, she is all but nine years of age. — All one, the same thing in effect; quite the same.

Yet I have the wit to think that my master is a kind of a knave; but that's all one if he be but one knave. Shak.

— All over, thoroughly; entirely; as, 'Dombe-y and Son' is Dickens all over. [Colloq.] — All out (O.E. and slang), entirely; quite. 'Then come these wykkade Jewes and shewe them all out.' Old MS. quoted by Halliwell. — All the, to all that extent; as, all the better; all the better; all the sooner. See THE. — All there (Slang), up to the mark; wide-awake; in strict fashion; first-rate.

All (al), n. 1. The whole number; as, all have not the same disposition; that is, all men, or all of a certain number in the mind of the speaker. — 2. The whole; the entire thing; the aggregate; the total.

And Laban said, All that thou seest is mine. Gen. xxxi. 43.

3. One's whole property; as, she has given her all. — And all, and everything else, after an enumeration of particulars; as, the tree fell, nest, young, and all. [This phrase does not necessarily imply that there is anything else than what is mentioned.] — At all, a phrase used by way of enforcement in negative and interrogative and sometimes other sentences or clauses of a negative import, and meaning, in the least degree, to the least extent, under any circumstances; as, he had no time at all at his disposal; have you any friends at all? (the interrogator implying that he does not believe the person addressed has any). 'An if this be at all' (where the speaker implies a doubt that there is no truth in what he has heard). Shak. — When all comes to all, in final result. — All and some, (a) all and sundry, one and all.

Stop your noses, readers, all and some. Dryden.

(b) Altogether; wholly. [Obsolete in both senses.] — All in all. See ALL-IN-ALL. — All in the wind (naut.), a phrase implying that the vessel's head is too close to the wind, so that the sails are shivering. — In all, everything reckoned or taken into account; all included; as, there were in all at least 400 persons present. — All, in composition, enlarges the meaning or adds force to a word, and it is generally more emphatic than most. In some instances all is incorporated into words, as in almighty, already, always; but in most instances it is prefixed to other words, but separated by a hyphen. As a prefix it has sometimes the force of an adverb; as, all-powerful, all-perfect, all-important; sometimes of a noun in the objective case; as, all-seeing; sometimes perhaps of a noun in the instrumental case; as, 'all-disgraced', 'all-dreaded' (Shak). — disgraced, dreaded by all, or entirely, wholly, disgraced, dreaded.

Alla (al'lā), [It., dat. of the fem. art. la = Fr. la.] In music, after the manner of; in the style of; as, alla francese, in the French style or manner.

Alla-breve (al'lā-brēv or al'lā-brī-vā), [It.] In music, a term signifying a quick time. In which the notes take much less than their usual length.

Alight (a-lit'), v. t. [A. Sax. alīhtan, polīhtan, to alight or light. See the verb LIGHT in this sense.] 1. To get down or descend, as from horseback or from a carriage. —2. To fall or descend and settle or lodge; as, a bird alights on a tree; snow alights on a roof.

But storms of stones from the proud temple's height
Fell down, and on our better'd helms alight. Dryden.

Alight (a-lit'), a. or adv. [Prefix a, on, in, or into, and light (which see).] 1. Lighted up. 'The lamps were alight.' Dickens. —2. Into light. 'He pretended to be blowing it alight again.' Dickens.

Align (a-lin'), v. t. [Fr. aligner, to align—a for ad, to, and ligne, L. linea, a line.] To adjust to a line; to lay out or regulate by a line; to form in line, as troops.

Alignment (a-lin'ment), n. [Fr.] 1. The act of aligning; the act of laying out or regulating by a line; an adjusting to a line; the state of being so adjusted; the line of adjustment; the line on which troops are formed in battle order. —2. In engin. the ground-plan of a railway or other road, in distinction from the gradients or profile.

Alike (a-līk'), a. [Prefix a, and like; A. Sax. alike, alike. See LIKE.] Having resemblance or similitude; similar; without difference.

In birth, in acts, in arms alike the rest. Fairfax.

The darkness and the light are both alike to thee. Ps. cxxxix. 12.

[This adjective never precedes the noun which it qualifies.]

Alike (a-līk'), adv. In the same manner, form, or degree; in common.

He fashioneth their hearts alike. Ps. xxxiii. 15.

However true it may be that all alike have sinned, it is far from true that all have sinned alike. Contemporary Review.

Alike-minded (a-līk'mind-ed), a. Having the same mind; like-minded. Sp. Hall.

Aliment (al'i-ment), v. t. In Soots law, to maintain or support, as a person unable to support himself; used especially in reference to the mutual obligation of parents and children to support each other.

Aliment (al'i-ment), n. [L. alimentum, nourishment—alo, to nourish, a verbal stem seen also in lcel. ala, to nourish; Goth. alēn, to grow, alja, to nourish; Gael. al, food, nurture.] That which nourishes; food; nutriment; anything which feeds or adds to substance, animal or vegetable, in natural growth; specifically (Soots law), the sum paid for support to any one entitled to claim it, as the dote paid to a pauper by his parish.

The alimenter was appointed to continue till the majority or marriage of the daughter. Erskine's Inst.

Alimental (al-i-ment'al), a. Of or pertaining to aliment; supplying food; having the quality of nourishing; furnishing the materials for natural growth; as, chyle is alimental; alimental sap.

Alimentally (al-i-ment'al-ly), adv. In an alimental manner; so as to serve for nourishment or food.

Alimentariness (al-i-ment'a-ri-ness), n. The quality of being alimentary, or of supplying nutriment.

Alimentary (al-i-ment'a-ri), a. Pertaining to aliment or food; having the quality of nourishing; as, alimentary particles. —Alimentary canal, in anat. the great duct or intestine in an animal body, from which the alimentary portion of the food is absorbed into the system, the useless parts being carried off by it. —Alimentary debt, in Soots law, a debt incurred for necessities or maintenance. —Alimentary fund, a fund set apart for the destination of the giver for an all-ment to the receiver. If not unreasonable for the rank of the receiver it is not arrestable by creditors.

Alimentation (al'i-ment-ā'shon), n. 1. The act or power of affording nutriment. —2. The state of being nourished.

Alimentiveness (al-i-ment'iv-ness), n. In phren. the organ that is said to communicate the pleasure which arises from eating and drinking, and which prompts us to take nourishment. Its supposed seat is in the zygomatic fossa.

Alimonious (al-i-mō'nī-us), a. [See ALIMONY.] Affording food; nourishing; nutritive. 'Alimonious humour.' Harvey. [Rare.]

Alimony (al'i-mō-ni), n. [L. alimenta, from alo, to feed. See ALIMENT.] In law, (a) an allowance out of her husband's estate made for the support of a woman legally separated from him when she is not charged with adultery or wilful desertion. (b) In Soots law, aliment. Braking.

Alimentation (a-lin'm-ā'shon), n. [L. a, by or from, and linea, a line.] The determination or ready recognition of the position of a more remote object, by following a line drawn through one or more intermediate and more easily recognizable objects, and imagined to be produced.

A method of determining the positions of the stars, susceptible of a little more exactness than the former, is the use of aliments, already noticed in speaking of Hipparchus' catalogue. Thus a straight line passing through two stars of the Great Bear passes also through the pole-star. Whevell.

Alloth (al'i-oth), n. [The Arabic name.] A star in the tail of the Great Bear (Ursæ), much used in finding the latitude. Also the very bright star Capella (α Aurigæ), in the constellation Auriga, or charioteer.

Aliped (a-lī-pēd or al'i-pēd), a. [L. ala, wing, and pes, pedis, a foot.] 1. Wing-footed; having the toes connected by a membrane, which serves as a wing, as the bat. —2. A swift of foot.

Aliped (a-lī-pēd or al'i-pēd), n. An animal whose toes are connected by a membrane, serving for a wing; a cheiropter, as the bat.

Aliquant (al'i-kwant), a. [L. aliquantum, somewhat.] In arith. applied to a number which does not measure another without a remainder. Thus 5 is an aliquant part of 16, for 3 times 5 are 15, leaving a remainder 1.

Aliquot (al'i-kwot), a. [L. aliquot, some, several.] In arith. applied to a part of a number or quantity which will measure it without a remainder. Thus 5 is an aliquot part of 15.

Alisander (a-lī-san'dér), n. Same as Alexanders.

Aliah (al'i-ah), a. Like ale; having the qualities of ale. 'A sweet aliah taste.' Mortimer.

Alisma (a-līz-ma), n. [Gr. alisma, water-plantain.] A genus of plants belonging to the nat. order Alismaceæ; water-plantain. All the species are aquatic; one, A. Plantago, the common water-plantain, is common in ditches in Britain. See WATER-PLANTAIN.

Alismaceæ (al-i-zm's-ē-s), n. pl. A nat. order of endogenous plants, growing in water or in marshes.

Alitrunk (al'i-trungk or al'i-trungk), n. [L. ala, a wing, and truncus, a trunk.] The segment of the posterior thorax of an insect to which the wings and two posterior pairs of legs are attached.

Alive (a-liv'), a. [Prefix a for on, and live; in Old English it was written on live, on lyve, where live, lyve is a dat. form of lyfe.] 1. Having life, in opposition to dead; being in a state in which the organs perform their functions; living; as, the man or plant is alive. —2. In a state of action; in force or operation; unextinguished; undestroyed; unexpired; as, keep the process alive. —3. Full of alacrity; cheerful; sprightly; lively; as, the company were all alive. —4. Keenly interested in and watchful after; having lively feelings; easily impressed; sensitive to; susceptible; as, he is sufficiently alive to the beauties of nature, but yet more alive to his own interests. —5. Exhibiting motion or moving bodies in great numbers; as, the city was all alive when the general entered. 6. Of all living, by way of emphasis.

The Earl of Northumberland was the proudest man alive. Clarendon.

[Alive always follows the noun which it qualifies.]

Alizarine (al'i-za-rin), n. [Fr. alizerine, from alizer, the commercial name of madder in the Levant, from the (Ar.) root of azur, with the article prefixed.] (C₁₅H₁₀O₄) A peculiar red colouring matter obtained from madder. It has been prepared artificially from coal-tar residues, which contain a substance called anthracene (C₁₄H₁₀). The elimination of hydrogen from, and addition of oxygen to, this body gives rise to the formation of alizarine.

Alk (alk), n. A resin obtained from Pistacia terebinthus.

Alkhest (al'ka-hest), n. [Etym. unknown.] The pretended universal solvent or menstruum of the alchemists.

Alkhestic (al-ka-hest'ik), a. Pertaining to the alkhest.

Alkalescence (al-ka-les'en-s), n. [See ALKALI.] A tendency to become alkaline; a tendency to the properties of an alkali; the state of a substance in which alkaline properties begin to be developed or to be predominant. Ure.

Alkalescent (al-ka-les'ent), a. Tending to the properties of an alkali; slightly alkaline.

Alkali (al'ka-li), n. pl. Alkalies or Alkalis (al'ka-liz), [Sp. Fr. alcali, Ar. al-qali, the ashes of the plant from which soda was first obtained, or the plant itself—Ar. al, the, and qali, to roast.] A term first used to designate the soluble part of the ashes of plants, especially of sea-weed. Now applied to various classes of bodies having the following properties in common:—(1) solubility in water; (2) the power of neutralizing acids, and forming salts with them; (3) the property of corroding animal and vegetable substances; (4) the property of altering the tint of many colouring matters—thus, they turn litmus, reddened by an acid, into blue; turmeric, brown; and syrup of violets and infusion of red cabbage, green. The alkalis are hydrates, or water in which half the hydrogen is replaced by a metal or compound radical. In its restricted and common sense the term is applied to four substances only: hydrate of potassium (potash), hydrate of sodium (soda), hydrate of lithium (lithia), and hydrate of ammonium (an aqueous solution of ammonia). In a more general sense it is applied to the hydrates of the so-called alkaline earths (baria, strontia, and lime), and to a large number of organic substances, both natural and artificial, described under ALKALOID.

Alkalifiable (al'ka-li-fi-a-bl or al'kal'i-fi-a-bl), a. Capable of being alkali-fied or converted into an alkali.

Alkalify (al'ka-li-fi or al'kal'i-fi), v. t. pret. & pp. alkalified; ppr. alkalifying. [Alkali, and L. facio, to make.] To form or to convert into an alkali; to alkalisate.

Alkalinity (al'ka-li-fi or al'kal'i-fi), v. t. To become an alkali.

Alkaligenous (al-ka-lij'en-us), a. [Alkali, and Gr. gennao, to generate.] Producing or generating alkali.

Alkalimeter (al-ka-lim'e-tér), n. [Alkali, and Gr. metron, measure.] An instrument for ascertaining the strength of alkalis, or the quantity of alkali in caustic potash and soda, by the quantity of dilute sulphuric acid, of a known strength, which a certain weight of them would neutralize. Ure.

Alkalimetric, Alkalimetric (al'ka-li-met'rik, al'ka-li-met'rik-al), a. Relating to alkalimetry.

Alkalimetry (al-ka-lim'e-t-ri), n. The finding of the amount of real alkali in an alkaline mixture or liquid. This may be done by volumetric analysis, that is, by estimating the amount of a standard acid solution which the alkaline mixture will saturate; or by gravimetric analysis, that is, by decomposing the substance and finding the weight of the alkali contained in it. Ure.

Alkalimide (al'kal'i-mid), n. [Alkali and amide.] Ammonia in which two or more atoms of hydrogen are replaced by acid and base radicals. See AMIDE, AMINE.

chive, and shallot. They contain free phosphoric acid and sulphuretted oil.

Allness (al'nes), n. Totality; entirety; completeness. 'The allness of God, including his absolute spirituality, supremacy, and eternity.' Rick. Turnbull.

Allocate (al'lo-kát), v.t. pret. & pp. allocated; ppr. allocating. [L. ad, to, and loco, locum, to place, from locus, a place.] To assign or allot; to set apart for a particular purpose; to distribute; as, to allocate shares in a public company.

The court is empowered to seize upon, and allocate, for the maintenance of each child, any sum not exceeding a third of the whole fortune. Burke.

Allocation (al'lo-ká'shon), n. 1. The act of allocating, allotting, or assigning; allotment; assignment; apportionment; as, the allocation of shares in a public company.—2. An allowance made upon accounts in the exchequer.

Allocatur (al'lo-kát'ér), n. [L. it is allowed.] In law, the allowance of something by a judge or court; specifically, the certificate of the allowance of costs of a proceeding by the master on taxation, equivalent to the report of the auditor in Scotch law.

Allochroite (al'lo-kró'ít), n. [Gr. allos, other, and chroma, colour.] A massive, fine-grained variety of iron garnet. This name is said to be given to it as expressive of its changes of colour before the blowpipe.

Allocation (al'lo-ká'shon), n. [L. allocutio, -ad, to, and locutio, from loquor, to speak.] A speaking to; an address, especially a formal address, as that of a pope to his clergy.

Scarcely a year of his pontificate passed without his having to pronounce an allocation on the oppression of the church in some country or other. Cardinal Wiseman.

Allod (al'ló-d), n. A freehold estate. Chambers's 14/ See ALLODIUM.

Allodial (al'ló-dí-al), a. Pertaining to allodium or freehold; free of rent or service; held independent of a lord paramount: opposed to feudal.

All over Norway the old patriarchal institutions, by which every freeman was prophet, priest, and king in his own family and in his own allodial freehold or 'odal,' as it was called, had passed away into an aristocracy of chiefs of greater or lesser means and power. Edin. Rev.

Allodial (al'ló-dí-al), n. Property held allodially.

The contested territory which lay between the Danube and the Naab, with the town of Neuburg and the allodials, were adjudged, &c. Cass.

Allodially (al'ló-dí-al-lí), adv. In an allodial manner.

Allodian (al'ló-dí-an), a. Allodial. [Rare.]

Allodium (al'ló-dí-um), n. [L. allodium, a freehold estate, from root seen in E. old, G. alt, and that in A. Sax. æthel, a country, Icel. adal, Dan. and Sw. odel, a patrimonial estate. 'In the Old Norse there is a compound alida-odal, a property of ages, or held for ages or generations. L. fundus ævius, an ancient allodial inheritance. . . . We believe the Mid. L. allodium to be derived from this compound by way of assimilation; the old Teutonic form would be alith-odal (Goth. alith=ærum) whence all-odal, allodium, property held in absolute possession, opposed to such as is held in fee, or subject to certain conditions.' Figueson. There had proposed the same etymology.] Freehold estate; land which is the absolute property of the owner; real estate held in absolute independence, without being subject to any rent, service, or acknowledgment to a superior. It is thus opposed to feud. In England there are no allodial lands, all being held of the crown.

Allograph (al'ló-graf), n. [Gr. allos, another, and graphein, to write.] In law, a deed not written by any of the parties thereto: opposed to autograph.

Allonger (al-lun'), n. [Fr. allonger, to lengthen, as the arm, hence, to thrust—ai for ad, and long, long.] 1. A pass or thrust with a sword or rapier; a lunge.—2. A long rein, when a horse is trotted in the hand. Johnson.—3. [A French usage.] A paper annexed to a bill of exchange, to receive endorsements two numerous to be contained in the bill itself; a rider.

Allonger (al-lun'), v.t. To make a pass or thrust with a rapier; to lunge.

Allot (al-ló), v.t. or i. To incite dogs by a call. 'Allot thy furious mastiff.' Philips. See HALLOO.

Allopathetic (al'lo-pa-thet'ík), a. Pertaining to allopathy. [Rare.]

Allopathetically (al'lo-pa-thet'ík-al-lí), adv. In a manner conformable to allopathy. Allopathic (al-ló-pá-thik, al-ló-pá-th'ík), a. Pertaining to allopathy.

There are only three imaginable methods of employing medicines against disease, and these are denominated antipathic, homoeopathic, and allopathic. Perrin.

Allopathist (al-ló-pá-thist), n. One who practices medicine according to the principles and rules of allopathy.

Allopathy (al-ló-pá-thí), n. [Gr. allos, other, and pathos, morbid condition.] That method of treating disease by which it is endeavored to produce a condition of the system either different from, opposite to, or incompatible with the condition essential to the disease: it is opposed to homoeopathy.

Allophone (al'ló-fón), n. [Gr. allos, other, and phaino, to appear.] A mineral of a pale blue, and sometimes of a green or brown colour. It is a hydro-alicate of aluminium, occurring in amorphous, botryoidal, or reniform masses.

Allophylian (al-ló-fí-lí-an), n. [Gr. allophylos, of another tribe or race, foreign—allos, other, and phylá, a tribe.] One of another tribe or race; specifically, a term used by some archaeologists to designate a member of the primitive tribes or races who are supposed to have inhabited Europe previous to the earliest historic indications of the Aryan nations passing into it.

Allophylian (al-ló-fí-lí-an), a. Of another race; foreign; strange; specifically, (a) pertaining to the allophylians or pre-Aryan inhabitants of Europe. (b) Pertaining to various outlying tribes of tongues which have not as yet been classified under any of the groups into which human speech has been divided. The native dialects of America, Australia, most of Africa, the Polynesian, Old Etruscan, Basque, &c., are allophylian. Allophylian races are mostly polysynthetic.

Alloquy (al'ló-kwí), n. [L. alloquium, from ad, to, and loquor, to speak.] A speaking to another; an address.

Allot (al-ló), v.t. pret. & pp. allotted; ppr. allotting. [O. Fr. allotir, alloter, to divide, part—ai for ad, and lotir, to cast lots for, to apportion, from lot, a share, which itself is a Teutonic word = A. Sax. lot. See LOT.] To divide or distribute as by lot; to distribute or parcel out in parts or portions; to grant; to assign; to appoint; to set apart; to destine.

Now, of what has been produced, a part only is allotted to the support of productive labour; and there will not, and cannot, be more of that labour than the portion so allotted (which is the capital of the country) can feed and provide with materials and instruments of production. J. S. Mill.

Allotable (al-ló-tá-bl), a. Capable of being allotted.

Allotment (al-ló-t'ment), n. 1. The act of allotting; distribution as by lot.—2. That which is allotted; a share, part, or portion granted or distributed; that which is assigned by lot or by the act of God. 'The allotments of God and nature.' L'Estrange. 3. A place or piece of ground appropriated. 'A vineyard and an allotment for olives.' Broomes.—Allotment of goods, in com. the dividing a ship's cargo into several parts, which are to be purchased by several persons, each person's share being assigned by lot.—Allotment of land, such portions of ground as are granted to claimants on the division and inclosure of commons and waste lands.—Allotment-note, a note signed by a seaman authorizing the periodical payment of a portion of his wages to another party, as to his wife.—Allotment system, the practice of dividing land into small portions for cultivation by agricultural labourers and other cottagers after they have performed their ordinary day's work.

Allotropic (al-ló-trop'ík), a. In chem. of or pertaining to allotropy.

Allotropy, Allotropism (al-ló-tro-pí, al-ló-tro-pí-zm), n. [Gr. allos, another, and tropos, condition.] In chem. the capability or characteristic exhibited by some elements of existing in more than one form, and with different characteristics. Carbon is a good example, as it crystallizes perfectly in the diamond, imperfectly in graphite, and is amorphous, yet quite distinct, in anthracite, coal, and charcoal.

Allottee (al-ló-té), n. One to whom anything is allotted, as the holder of an allotment-note and the like.

The allotment of gardens, which yield a partial support to the allottee, is another means of cheap labour. Mayhew

Allottery (al-ló-tér-lí), n. Allotment; what is allotted or assigned to use.

Give me the poor allottery my father left me by testament. Shak.

All-over, All-overish (al'ó-vér, al'ó-vér-ish), a. Giving a general sense of bodily uneasiness or slight indisposition; as, an all-overish sort of feeling. [Vulgar.]

Allow (al-ló), v.t. [Two words are in this confounded under one form, the E. allow being based partly on Fr. allowier, to allow, to grant, to settle, from L. l. alloware—ad, to, and locare (from locus, a place), to place or assign, to let or lease; and partly on an obs. Fr. allowier, to approve or praise, from L. ad, and laudare, to praise, from laus, laudis, praise. The French has still the two simple verbs louer, to let or hire, from L. locare, and louer, to praise or commend, from L. laudare.] 1. To grant, give, or yield; to assign; to afford; as, to allow a free passage.

He was allowed about three hundred pounds a year. Macaulay.

2. To admit; to own or acknowledge; as, to allow the right of the king to dismiss his ministers.

The power of music all our hearts allow. Pope. He would allow only of two kinds. Brougham.

3. † To invest; to intrust. 'Thou shalt be allowed with absolute power.' Shak.—4. † To approve, justify, or sanction.

Ye allow the deeds of your fathers. Luke xi. 48. The hospitality and aims of abbots is not altogether to be allowed or dispraised.

There is no slander in an allowed fool. Shak.

—Allow, Permit, Suffer, Tolerate. Allow and permit are often used synonymously; but allow rather implies a formal sanction; permit, that we merely do not hinder; suffer is still more passive than permit, and may imply that we do not prevent something, though we feel it to be disagreeable, or know it to be wrong; tolerate is always used in the sense of permitting or bearing something unpleasant.

Allow (al-ló), v.i. 1. To concede; to make abatement, concession, or provision. 'Allowing still for the different ways of making it.' Addison.—2. To connive. 'Her allowing husband.' Shak.—To allow of, to permit; to admit. 'Of this allow.' Shak. 'Ere I will allow of thy wits.' Shak.

Allowable (al-ló-u'a-bl), a. Proper to be or capable of being allowed or permitted as lawful, true, or proper; not forbidden; not unlawful or improper; permissible; as, a certain degree of freedom is allowable among friends.

In actions of this sort, the light of nature alone may discover that which is in the sight of God allowable. Hooker.

Allowableness (al-ló-u'a-bl-nes), n. The quality of being allowable; exemption from prohibition or impropriety; lawfulness.

Lots, as to their nature, use, and allowableness, in matters of recreation, are indeed impregnated by some. South.

Allowably (al-ló-u'a-blí), adv. In an allowable manner; with propriety.

Allowance (al-ló-u'ans), n. 1. Permission; license; sanction; as, my allowance of this course will depend on circumstances.—2. Assent to a fact or state of things; admission; a granting.—3. † Approval; approbation.

Humbly craving . . . it may receive approbation and patronage from so learned and judicious a Prince as your Highness is, whose allowance and acceptance of our labours shall more honour and encourage us than all the calumnies and hard interpretations of other men shall dismay us. Epistle Dedicatory to the Bible.

4. A stated quantity, as of money, or of food or drink, allowed for maintenance; a settled rate; quantity allowed or granted.

Though he drew a large allowance under pretence of keeping a public table, he never asked a minister to dinner. Macaulay.

5. Charitable overlooking of faults; relaxation of severity in censure; as, to make an allowance for the inexperience of youth.—6. † Established character; reputation. 'His plot of very expert and approved allowance.' Shak.—7. In com. a deduction or abatement from the gross weight of goods, according to the customs of particular countries and ports, the chief of which is called tars.

Allowance (al-lou'ans), v.t. To put upon allowance; to restrain or limit to a certain amount of money or stated quantity of provisions or drink; as, distress compelled the captain of the ship to allowance his crew.

Allowedly (al-lou-ed-li), adv. Admittedly.

Allow (al-lou'ér), n. One who allows, permits, grants, or authorizes.

Alloxan (al-loks'an), n. ($C_4H_3N_3O_4$). One of the products of the decomposition of uric acid by nitric acid. When treated with alkalies it produces alloxanic acid, the salts of which are termed alloxanates.

Alloxanate (al-loks'an-át), n. A salt formed by the union of alloxanic acid and a base.

Alloxanic (al-loks'an-ik), a. Pertaining to or produced by alloxan; as, alloxanic acid.

Alloxantin (al-loks'an-tin), n. ($C_4H_3N_3O_4 + 3H_2O$). A white crystalline substance obtained when alloxan is brought into contact with zinc and hydrochloric acid, with chloride of zinc, or sulphureted hydrogen. Oxidizing agents reconvert this substance into alloxan. Called also Uroasin.

Alloy (al-loi'), n. [Fr. aloi, legal standard of coin.—a, according to, and loi, law, from L. lex, legis, law. In O. Fr. loi had the meaning of standard alloy for coin, as Sp. ley has still.] 1. A baser metal mixed with a finer; the cheapest metal of a mixture. 2. A mixture of different metals; any metallic compound. Alloys of metallic substances are either natural or artificial; but those which are artificial are by far the most important. By far the greater number of the metals may be alloyed together in varying proportions. Some of the alloys, however, form definite chemical compounds. When mercury is one of the component parts the alloy is called an amalgam.—3. Fig. evil mixed with good; as, no happiness is without alloy.

Alloy (al-loi'), v.t. 1. To reduce the purity of a metal by mixing with it a portion of one less valuable; as, to alloy gold with silver, or silver with copper.—2. To reduce, abate, or impair by mixture; as, to alloy pleasure with misfortunes.

Alloyage (al-loi'áj), n. 1. The act of alloying metals, or the mixture of a baser metal with a finer, to reduce its purity; the act of mixing metals.—2. A mixture of different metals; an alloy.

All-saints'-day (al'sánts-dá), n. All-Hallowmas or Hallowmas, a festival of the Roman Catholic Church, instituted by Pope Gregory IV., in 835, and dedicated to all the saints in general, on account of the impossibility of allotting a day to each saint. It is celebrated on the 1st November, this day being chosen because it was one of the four great heathen festivals of the northern nations, the policy of the early Church being, not so much directly to oppose paganism in many respects, as to supplant it by giving a Christian character to its observance.

All-seed (al'séed), n. A name applied to two very different British plants, the one Polycarpon tetraphyllum, a small plant found in the south-west of England, the other Chenopodium polypernum, found in waste places.

All-sorts (al'sorts), n. A term used in taverns or beer-shops to denote a beverage composed of left drops of liquor of various descriptions mixed together.—All sorts of, a low term used in the Southern States of America for acute, capital, excellent; as, all sorts of a fellow.

All-souls'-day (al'sóls-dá), n. The 2d November, a festival in the Roman Catholic Church, when prayers are publicly offered for the release of souls from purgatory.

All-spice (al'spíe), n. The fruit of Eugenia Jambata, a tree of the West Indies; a spice of a mildly pungent taste, and agreeably aromatic. Its odour and flavour are supposed to combine those of cinnamon, cloves, and nutmeg, hence the name. Called also Jamaica Pepper.

Allude (al-lú'd), v.i. [L. alludo, to smile upon or make sport with—ad, and ludo, to play.] To refer to something not directly mentioned; to have reference; to hint at by remote suggestions.

These speeches . . . do seem to allude unto such ministerial garments as were then in use. Hooker.

—Advert, Allude, Refer. See under ADVERT.

SYN. To hint, refer, suggest, intimate, glance at, advert to.

Allude (al-lú'd), v.t. To compare.

To free myself from the imputation of partiality, I'll at last allude her to a waterman. John Taylor.

Allumée (al-lúm-é or al-lúm-á), n. In her. applied to the eyes of a bear or other beast, when they are drawn red and sparkling.

Allumette (al-lú-met), n. [Fr.] A match for lighting candles, lamps, &c.

Alluvial (al-lú'vi-al), a. [See ALLUVIUM.] Pertaining to or having the character of alluvium; deposited or thrown up by the action of waves or currents of water; as, alluvial deposits; alluvial soil.—Alluvial formations, in geol. recent deposits in valleys or in plains of the detritus of the neighbouring mountains, brought down chiefly by the action of water. Most of our river-plains—the haughs, carse, and straths of Scotland, and the dales, holms, and fens of England—are alluvial, having been deposited from the waters either of a river, a lake, or an arm of the sea. See ALLUVIUM.

Alluvion, Alluvio (al-lú'vi-on, al-lú'vi-ón), n. The washing up of sand or earth so as to form new soil; the soil thus formed; alluvium: now more especially used as a legal term, and signifying an increase of land on a shore or bank of a river by the action of water, as by a current or by waves. If the addition has been gradual and imperceptible the owner of the land thus augmented has a right to the alluvial earth; but if the addition has been sudden and considerable, by the law of England the alluvion is the property of the crown, while by the law of Scotland it remains the property of the person of whose lands it originally formed part. Alluvions (al-lú'vi-us), a. The same as Al-luvium. [Rare.]

Alluvium (al-lú'vi-um), n. [L. alluvio, alluvionis, an inundation, alluvius, alluvial—ad, to, and luc = Gr. lous, L. lavo, to wash. Stem seen also in deluge, lave, lotion, dilute, &c.] In geol. and phys. geog. a deposit collected by means of the action of water, such as are found in valleys and plains, consisting of gravel, loam, clay, or other earths washed down from the mountains or high grounds. Great alterations in the limits of countries are produced by alluvial deposits along the sea-shores, the banks of rivers or at their mouths, forming deltas, valley-bottoms (straths), &c.

Ally (al-lí'), v.t. pret. & pp. allied; ppr. allying. [Fr. allier, to join, to unite; reciprocal verb s'allier, to confederate or become allied,—al for ad, to, and lier, to tie or unite; L. ligo, to bind.] 1. To unite by marriage, treaty, league, or confederacy; to connect by formal agreement; generally used in passive or with reflexive pronouns.—2. To bind together; to connect, as by similitude, resemblance, or friendship.

Wants, frailties, passions, closer still ally The common interests, or endear the tie. Pope.

Ally (al-lí'), n. To be closely united.

Ally (al-lí'), n. A prince or state united by treaty or league; a confederate; one related by marriage or other tie: seldom applied now to individuals, except to princes in their public capacity.

The foe, the victim, and the fond ally That fights for all, but ever fights in vain. Byron.

You must talk much of your kindred and allies (acquaintance). B. Jonson.

Allyl (al'lí), n. (C_3H_5). A radicle which cannot exist in the free state. At the moment of its liberation two molecules combine together to form diallyl ($2C_3H_5$ or C_6H_{10}). Diallyl is a pungent ethereal liquid. The hydrate of this substance is called allyl alcohol (C_3H_5O).

Allylamine (al-lí'a-mín), n. A mobile liquid having a sharp burning taste, produced by the action of potash on allyl cyanate. It may be regarded as ammonia in which one hydrogen atom is replaced by allyl ($NH_2C_3H_5$).

Allylene (al'lí-én), n. A gaseous hydrocarbon (C_3H_4), standing in the same relation to allyl (C_3H_5) as ethylene (C_2H_4) to ethyl (C_2H_5).

Almacantar (al-ma-kan'tár), n. See ALMUCANTAR.

Almadie, Almadý (al'ma-dí), n. [Fr. al-madie; Sp. almadía, from Ar. al-madiyat, a raft.] A boat used in India, about 80 feet long and 6 or 7 broad, shaped like a shuttle; also, a small African canoe, made of the bark of trees. Some of the larger square-sterned negro boats are also thus designated.

Almagest (al'ma-jest), n. [A hybrid word composed of Ar. al, the, and Gr. magisté (biblos), greatest book.] A book or collection of problems in astronomy and geometry, drawn up by Ptolemy, and so named by the Arabs because it was reckoned the greatest and most complete on the subjects. The same title has been given to other works of a like kind.

Almagra (al-má'gra), n. [Sp., from Ar. al-maghrat, red clay or earth.] A fine deep red ochre, with an admixture of purple, used in India for staining the person. Sometimes used as a paint, and for polishing silver and glass, under the name of Indian red.

Almain-rivet. See ALMAYNE-RIVET.

Alma Mater (al'ma má'tér), n. [L. benignu mother, fostering mother.] An epithet first given to the earth as the mother of all; then applied by students to the university where they have been trained.

Alman (al'man), n. Same as Almond-furnace.

Almanac, Almanack (al'ma-nak), n. [Fr. almanach, It. almanacco, Sp. almanaque, Ar. al-manakh, probably from a root meaning to reckon; Heb. manaah.] A table, book, or publication of some kind, generally annual, comprising a calendar of days, weeks, and months, with the times of the rising of the sun and moon, changes of the moon, eclipses, hours of full tide, stated festivals of churches, stated terms of courts, &c., for a certain year or years. Almanacs owed their origin to astrology, and existed in the East and in Egypt in remote ages. The agricultural, political, and statistical information which is usually contained in popular almanacs, though as valuable a part of the work as any, is comparatively of modern date. — Nautical almanac, an almanac published annually by the British government, under the superintendence of the astronomer-royal, and always several years in advance. It contains, among other things, the distances of the moon from the sun and fixed stars for every three hours of apparent time, adapted to the meridian of Greenwich; by comparing which with the distances carefully observed at sea, the mariner may readily infer his longitude to a degree of exactness that is found sufficient for most nautical purposes.

Almandine (al'man-din), n. [Fr. almandine, L.L. almandinus, almandinus, alabandinus, a gem brought from Alabanda, a city in Asia Minor.] Precious or noble garnet, a beautiful mineral of a red colour, of various shades, sometimes tinged with yellow or blue. It is commonly translucent, sometimes transparent. It occurs crystallized in the rhombic dodecahedron. See GARNET.
Almandine, n. An almand-tree. Cheeser.
Almand-rivet (al'man-riv-et), n. Same as Almayne-rivet.

Almayne-rivet, Almain-rivet (al-mān-riv-et), n. [Fr. almaine, German.] In military use, one of a series of rivets or short pieces of metal sliding in slot-holes formed in the overlapping plates of armour, so that the plates would yield to the motions of the human body, first used by the Germans about 1450. The term Almayne-rivet came afterwards to be applied to suite of armour constructed in this manner.

Alma, Almah (al'mā), n. The name given in some parts of the East, and especially in Egypt, to girls whose occupation is to amuse company with singing and dancing, or to sing dirges at funerals. 'The almahs lift their arms in dance.' Bayard Taylor.

Almahrah, Almahrah (al-mā'rah, al-mā'rah), n. [Ar. al, the, and mahrah, the praying-place in a mosque.] Same as Mahrah (which see).

Almena (al-mā'nā), n. A weight of 3 lbs., used to weigh saffron in several parts of Asia.

Almese, n. [See ALMS.] Alma.

Almucantarat (al-mi-kan'tār-at), n. Same as Almucantar.

Almightily (al-mi'ti-lē), adv. In an almighty manner, with almighty power. H. Taylor (Rare).

Almightiness (al-mi'ti-nēs), n. The quality of being almighty; omnipotence; infinite or boundless power. 'The force of his almightiness.' Jer. Taylor.

Almighty (al-mi'ti), a. [All and mighty. See MYST.] 1. Possessing all power; omnipotent, being of unlimited might; being of boundless sufficiency. — 2. Great; extreme.

Poor Aaron can not live, and can not die, — so that he is in an almighty fix. De Quincey.

— Almighty dollar, a phrase forcibly expressive of the power of money, first used by Washington Irving in a sketch of a 'Crook Village' published in 1837. The idea of this phrase, however, is much older than Irving's time, Ben Jonson's 'Epistle to Elizabeth, Countess of Rutland,' commencing thus:

When that for which all virtue now is sold,
And almost every vice, almighty gold.

The Almighty, the omnipotent God. 'By the Almighty, who shall bless thee.' Gen. xlii 25.

Almond (a'mund), n. [Fr. amande, Fr. amandus, L.L. amandus, corrupted from L. amygdala, Gr. amygdallē, an almond. In G. it appears as mandel, in D. as amandel.] 1. The seed or kernel of Amygdalus communis, or almond-tree, probably a native of Barbary. The fruit is a drupe, ovoid, and with downy outer surface; the fleshy covering is tough and fibrous, it covers the compressed wrinkled stone inclosing the seed or almond within it. There are two varieties, one sweet and the other bitter, both are produced from A. communis, though from different varieties. The chief kinds of sweet almonds are the Valentinian, Jordan, and Malaga. They contain a bland fixed oil, consisting chiefly of olein. Bitter almonds come from Magadore, and besides a fixed oil they contain an acrid substance called emulsin, and also a bitter crystalline substance called amygdalin, which, acting on the emulsin, produces prussic acid; hence the aroma of bitter almonds when mixed with water. Almond-oil is expressed from the kernels. The name almond, with a qualifying word prefixed, is also given to the seeds of other species of plants, thus, Java almonds are the kernels of Canarium comans. — 2. In lapidary work, a piece of rock-crystal used in adorning branch candlesticks: so called from its resemblance to the almond. — Almond of the throat, one of the glands commonly known as tonsils.

Almond-oak (a'mund-kā), n. The cake left after expressing the oil from the almond. Its powder is used as soap in washing the hands.

Almond-furnace (a'mund-fēr-nis), n. [Perhaps corrupted from Fr. almand, German, and meaning therefore German furnace.] A furnace in which the slags of litharge, left in refining silver, are reduced to lead by being heated with charcoal, which, combining with the oxygen, forms carbonic acid gas, which escapes and leaves the metal pure.

Almondine (al'man-din), n. Precious or noble garnet; almandine (which see).

But I would throw to them back in mine,
Turkis and agate and almandine. Tennyson.

Almond-oil (a'mund-ōil), n. A bland, fixed oil obtained from almonds by pressure, used in medicine as a demulcent in catarrhal affections.

Almond-paste (a'mund-pāst), n. A cosmetic to soften the skin and prevent chaps, composed of bitter almonds, white of egg, rose-water, and rectified spirit.

Almond-tree (a'mund-trē), n. A species of Amygdalus (A. communis); the tree which produces the almond. The leaves and flowers resemble those of the peach, but the fruit is longer and more compressed, the green coat is fibrous, thinner, and drier when ripe, and the shell is not so rugged. The almond-tree is only grown in this country for the sake of its beautiful vernal flowers, which appear before the leaves. It seldom ripens its fruit even in the south of England, except in unusually hot summers, preceded by mild and uninterrupted springs.

Almond-willow (a'mund-wil-lō), n. The Salix amygdalina, a British species of willow, the leaves of which resemble those of the almond-tree, being light green on both sides.

Almoner (al'mon-ēr), n. [O Fr. almonier, Fr. almonier, L.L. almonarius, elemosynarius, from Gr. elemosynē, really the same word as E. alms. See ALMS.] A dispenser of alms or charity; more especially an officer who directs or carries out the distribution of charitable doles in connection with religious communities, hospitals, or almshouses, or on behalf of some superior. In England there is a lord-almoner, or lord high-almoner, an ecclesiastical officer, generally a bishop, who formerly had the forfeiture of all deadlands and the goods of self-murderers, which he had to distribute to the poor. He distributes twice a year the sovereign's bounty, which consists in giving a silver penny each to as many poor persons as the sovereign is years of age. There is also a sub-almoner, and a hereditary grand almoner. The office of the latter is now almost a sinecure.

Almory (al'mon-ri), n. [L.L. almosynarium, elemosynarium. See ALMS. Corrupted into amby, dumby, or aumery. See AKERY]

1. The place where an almoner resides, or where alms are distributed. — 2. A receptacle for articles; a closet; a cupboard; an amby. See AKERY.

Almory (a'mō-ri), n. Same as Almory.
Almost (al'mōst), adv. [All and most. In Anglo-Saxon the two elements were written separately, thus: 'All most who were present' (Sax Chron.). We now use a duplication, almost all who were present.] Nearly; well nigh; for the greatest part.

Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian. Acts xvi. 18.

Almry (al'mr-i), n. Same as Almory.
Alms (āms), n. [A. Sax. almes, almesse, O.E. almesse, almes, almous, almose, &c., Sc. almous, borrowed, like G. almosen, Icel. almusa, Fr. aumône, aumône, from L. elemosyna, alms, from Gr. elemosynē, plty, from eleō, to pity.] This English monosyllable alms has descended to us from the Greek and Latin word of six syllables, and it well exemplifies the remark of Horne Tooke that 'letters, like soldiers, are apt to desert and drop off in a long march.' Worcester. Anything given gratuitously to relieve the poor, as money, food, or clothing; a charitable dole: charity.

When thou doest alms, let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth. Mat. vi. 3.

Knock set himself.
Scorning an alms, to work whereby to live. Tennyson.

— Tenure by free alms, in England, a tenure by which the possessor is bound to pray for the soul of the donor, whether dead or alive; frankalmoinage (which see). [This word (like riches) is strictly a singular, but its apparently plural form has caused it to be often regarded as grammatically plural.]

Alms-deed (āms'dēd), n. An act of charity; a charitable gift. Acts ix. 36.

Alms-drink (āms'drīng), n. The leavings of drink, such as might be given away in alms.

nd Serv. Lepidus is high-coloured.
1st Serv. They have made him drink alms-drink. Shaks.

Alms-fee (āms'fē), n. Alms-money.

Almsgiving (āms'giv-ing), n. The act of giving alms.

Alms-house (āms'hōus), n. A house appropriated for the use of the poor who are supported by the public or by a revenue derived from private endowment, a poor-house.

Alms-man (āms'mān), n. pl. Alms-men (āms'mēn). 1. A person supported by charity or by public provision.

Even bees, the little alms-men of spring bowers. Keble.

2. A charitable person. Bacon. [Obsolete and rare.]

Almucantar, Almucantar (al-mū-kan'tār, al-mū-kan'tār), n. [Ar. almucantar, solar quadrant, clock — al, the, and muqantar, circles parallel to the horizon, from qantara, to bend. Mahā.]

In astron. a small circle of the sphere parallel to the horizon, a circle or parallel of altitude. When two stars have the same almucantar they have the same altitude — Almucantar staff, an instrument having an arc of 15°, formerly used to take observations of the sun about the time of its rising or setting, to find the amplitude and the variations of the compass.

Almuce, Aumuce (al'mūs, a'mūs), n. [O Fr. almuce, aumuce, aumuce, Fr. almuce, Sp. almucia, a hybrid word composed of Ar. al, the, and the Teutonic word seen as G. mütze, a cap.

D. mütze, Sc. mutch.] A furred hood having long ends hanging down the front of the dress, something like the stole; worn by allusion to snow-capped hills. See ALBION.] A high mountain; specifically, in the plural, the great mountain-ranges in Switzerland, the north of Italy, and in Austria, comprising the loftiest mountains in Europe.

North breath of vernal air from snowy alp. Milton.
Hills peep o'er hills, and alps on alps arise. Pope.

Alpaca (al-pak'a), n. [Peruv. paco, alpaco. The al is probably the Ar. art. the, through the Span. la.] 1. A ruminant mammal, of the camel tribe, and genus Auchenia (A. Paco), a native of the Andes, especially of the mountains of Chili and Peru, and so closely allied to the llama that by some it is regarded rather as a smaller variety than a distinct species. It has been domesticated, and remains also in a wild state. In form and size it approaches the sheep, but has a longer neck. It is valued chiefly for its long, soft, and silky wool, which is straighter than that of the sheep, and very strong, and is woven into fabrics of great beauty. Its flesh is pleasant and wholesome.—2. A fabric manufactured from the hair or wool of the alpaca, used for shawls, clothing for warm climates, coat-linings, and very largely for umbrellas.

Alpen (al'pen), a. Of or pertaining to the Alps; Alpine. 'The Alpen snow.' J. Fletcher.
Alpen-horn (al'pen-horn), n. [G. Alpen, the Alps, and horn, a horn.] A very long, powerful, nearly straight horn, but curving slightly Already (al-red't), adv. [All and ready. See READY.] Before the present time; before some specified time, either future, present, or past.

Elias is come already. Mat. xvii. 12.
Joseph was in Egypt already. Ex. i. 5.

It has reference to past time, but may be used for a future past; as, when you shall arrive the business will be already completed, or will have been completed already.

Alst (als), adv. or conj. [Corrupted from A. Sax. eall-sud, alred, that is, all-so; whence also and as.] 1. Also; likewise.—2. As.

Alsatian (al-sä-shi-an), a. 1. Of or pertaining to the province of Alsace (G. Elsass), in Germany.—2. Of or pertaining to Alsatia, formerly a cant name for Whitefriars, a district in London between the Thames and Fleet Street, and adjoining the Temple, which, possessing certain privileges of sanctuary, became for that reason a nest of mischievous characters, who were generally obnoxious to the law. These privileges it derived from having been an establishment of the Carmelites or White Friars (founded in 1241), and James I. confirmed and added to them by charter in 1608. They were abolished in 1697. The name Alsatia is a Latinized form of Alsace, a German province on the frontiers of France, which, like our own 'debatable land,' was a harbour for necessitous or troublesome characters from both countries.

Alsatian (al-sä-shi-an), n. 1. A native or inhabitant of the province of Alsace (G. Elsass), in Germany.—2. An inhabitant of Alsatia, or Whitefriars, London.

Shall light on you, so light the harms also. Old play.

2. In addition; too; further.

God do so to me, and more also: for thou shalt surely die. 1 Sam. xiv. 44.

Alsophila (al-sö'fi-la), n. [Gr. alao, a grove, and phileo, to love—from the habitat of the plant.] A genus of tropical cyatheaceous ferns, often becoming magnificent trees, distinguished from the allied forms by having no indusium to the sorus. A. excelsa of Norfolk Island rises to the height of 80 feet.

Alstromeria (al-strë-më'ri-a), n. [In honour of Baron Claudius Alströmer, a Swedish botanist.] A beautiful genus of South American plants, nat. order Amaryllidaceæ, much cultivated in our greenhouses.

Alt (ält), n. In music, a term applied to the high notes of the scale.

Altaic, Altaian (al-tä'ik, al-tä'yan), a. Pertaining to the Altai, a vast range of mountains extending in an easterly direction through a considerable part of Asia, and forming part of the boundary between the Russian and Chinese dominions.—Altaic or Altaian family of languages, a family of languages occupying a portion of Northern and Eastern Europe, and nearly the whole of Northern and Central Asia, together with some other regions, and divided into five branches, the Ugrian or Finno-Hungarian, Samoyedic, Turkic, Mongolic, and Tungusic.

Also called Scythian, Ural-Altaic, Talaric, and Turanian.

Altair (äl-tä'ër), n. The Arabic name for α Aquilæ, the most important star in the constellation Aquila. It is one of the stars of which the lunar distances are calculated and tabulated in the Nautical Almanac, and is therefore useful in finding the longitude.

Altaite (äl-tä'ti), n. A mineral found, with petzite, in the Altai Mountains. It consists of lead and tellurium, with a small proportion of silver.

Altambour (al-tam-bör), n. [Ar. al, the, and tumbür, a kind of lute or guitar, a drum.] A large Spanish or Moorish drum.

Altar (al'tër), n. [L. altare, from a root seen in L. altus, high.] 1. An elevated place on which sacrifices were offered or incense burned to a deity. The earliest altars were turf mounds, large flat-topped stones, or other rude elevations, natural or artificial; but when temples came to be built altars were made of hewn stone or marble, and became progressively more and more adorned. Greek and Roman altars were round, triangular, or square in form, often adorned with sculpture of the most tasteful and elaborate description, and bearing inscriptions. The Jews had the altar of burnt-offering, which stood at the entrance to the tabernacle, and afterwards occupied a corresponding site in the temple, and the altar of incense, which stood in the holy place. Both were made of shittimtemporary canopy erected over an altar on special solemnities. Res. F. G. Lee.

Altar-horn (al'tér-horn), n. One of the western corners of the altar. The north corner is called the Gospel horn, the southern the Epistle horn. Res. F. G. Lee.

Altarist, Altar-thane (al'tér-ist, al'tér-thán), n. In old law, an appellation given to the priest to whom the altarage belonged; also, a chaplain.

Altar-ledge (al'tér-ies), n. A step or ledge behind an altar, on which the cross, candlesticks, and flower-vases are placed. Res. F. G. Lee.

Altar-piece (al'tér-pés), n. A painting or piece of sculpture placed behind or above an altar in a church; also the decorative portion of an altar.

Altar-rail (al'tér-rál), n. The low rail or balustrade which fences off the sanctuary from the choir in the chancel.

Altar-screen (al'tér-skreen), n. In arch. (a) the partition of stone, wood, or metal, behind the high altar, separating the choir from the east end of the building. (b) The shrine or tabernacle work including the painted or sculptured altar-piece.

Altar-side (al'tér-sid), n. That part of the altar which faces the congregation.

Altar-stairs (al'tér-stáiz), n. pl. Stairs leading up to an altar.

The great world's altar-stairs,
That slope thro' darkness up to God. Tennyson.

Altar-stole (al'tér-stól), n. A mediæval ornament shaped like the ends of a stole, which hung down in front of the altar-cloth. Res. F. G. Lee.

Altar-table (al'tér-tá-bl), n. A table, generally of wood, and supported on four legs, on which, in the Church of England, the communion elements are placed, the communion table. At first this table was placed by the Reformers in the situation occupied by the old stone altars, namely, attached to an eastern wall. This position gave umbrage to the Puritans, and Cromwell caused it to be removed to the middle of the chancel, and to be surrounded with seats for the communicants. At the Restoration it was almost universally replaced in its ancient position. When used it is covered with a white linen cloth.

Altar-thane. See ALTARIST.

Altar-tomb (al'tér-tóm), n. In arch. a raised tomb, or monument surmounting a tomb, having a general resemblance to an altar:

Tomb of the Black Prince, Canterbury Cathedral.

altar-tombs are frequently surmounted by a recumbent effigy

Altar-vase (al'tér-váz), n. A vase for holding flowers to decorate the altar

Altar-vessel (al'tér-ve'sel), n. One of the vessels used in the services of the altar, namely, the chalice, paten, and ciborium.

Altar-wall (al'tér-wál), n. The wall behind an altar.

Altar-wise (al'tér-wiz), adv. Placed in the manner of an altar, that is, with its ends towards the north and south. Abb. Leard.

Altazimuth (al'tér-i-meth), n. [Abbrev. of altitude-azimuth.] In astron. a telescope so arranged as to be capable of being turned round horizontally to any point of the compass, and so differing from a transit-circle, which is fixed in the meridian. The altazimuth is brought to bear upon objects by motions affecting their altitude and azimuth. Called also an Altitude-and-azimuth Instrument.

Alter (al'tér), v. t. [L.L. altero, to change, from alter, another of two—made up of root al, another, seen in alvus, Gr. allos, another, and compar. suffix ter, seen in L. uicer, whether, Gr. Astero, another = E. ther in other, etc.] 1. To make some change in; to make different in some particular; to vary in some degree, without an entire change.

My covenant will I not break, nor alter the thing that is gone out of my lips. Ps. lxxviii. 34.

2. To change entirely or materially; as, to alter an opinion.

She promised that no force,
Persuasion, no, nor death could alter her. Tennyson.

3. † To exchange. 'She that would alter services with thee.' Shak. — 4. † To agitate.

'Altered and moved inwardly.' Milton.—Altered strata, in geol. strata whose constituent mineral elements have undergone physical and chemical change, under the influence of heat and moisture, percolation of mineral solutions, or of pressure. See Metamorphic Rocks under METAMORPHIC.

Alter, Change. In general alter is to change partially, while change is more commonly to substitute one thing for another, or to make a material difference in a thing.

Alter (al'tér), v. i. To become, in some respects, different; to vary; to change.

The law of the Medes and Persians, which altereth not. Dan. vi. 8.

Love is not love which alters. Shak.

Alterability (al'tér-a-bil'i-ti), n. The quality of being susceptible of alteration.

Alterable (al'tér-a-bl), a. Capable of being altered, varied, or made different.

Alterableness (al'tér-a-bl-nes), n. The quality of being alterable or admitting alteration; variability.

Alterably (al'tér-a-bl), adv. In an alterable manner; so as to be altered or varied.

Alteraget (al'tér-áj), n. [From alio, alium or altum, to feed, or from alter, another.] The nourishing or fostering of a child. Sir J. Davies.

Alterant (al'tér-ant), a. Altering; gradually changing. 'Whether the body be alterant or altered.' Bacon.

Alterant (al'tér-ant), n. An alternative (which see). [Rare.]

Alterate (al'tér-át), p. and a. 1. Altered; changed.—2. Fickle, changeable. Chaucer.

Alteration (al'tér-á-shon), n. [L. alteratio. See ALTER.] The act of altering, making different, or of varying in some particular, the state of being altered, also, the change made, or the loss or acquisition of qualities not essential to the form or nature of a thing.

Appius Claudius admitted to the senate the sons of those who had been slaves, by which, and succeeding alterations, that council degenerated into a most corrupt body. Swift.

Alterative (al'tér-át-iv), a. Causing alteration, having the power to alter, especially, in med. having the power to restore the healthy functions of the body, without sensible evacuations.

Alterative (al'tér-át-iv), n. A medicine, as mercury, iodine, &c., which, administered in small doses, gradually induces a change in the habit or constitution, and imperceptibly alters disordered secretions and actions, and restores healthy functions without producing any sensible evacuation by perspiration, purging, or vomiting.

Altercate (al'tér-kát), v. i. [L. altercor, alteratus, to wrangle, from alter, another.] To contend in words, to dispute with zeal, heat, or anger; to wrangle.

Altercation (al'tér-ká-shon), n. [L. altercatio. See ALTERNATE.] The act of altercation, warm contention in words; dispute carried on with heat or anger; controversy; wrangle. 'As if the constitution of our a structure pointing heavenward, magnificent as a whole, and full of symbolic meaning. See ALTAR TABLE.

Altarage (al'tér-áj), n. 1. Offerings made upon an altar or to a church. 2. The profits arising to priests from oblations, gifts, or dues on account of the altar, the small tithes. Called also Altar-dues. 3. In Scotland, formerly an endowment granted for the saying of masses at a particular altar for deceased friends.

Altar-bread (al'tér-bred), n. Bread prepared for the eucharist. According to the use of the Roman Catholic Church it is round and unleavened and stamped with an IHS or a crucifix.

Altar-card (al'tér-kárd), n. A printed or written transcript of certain portions of the communion service for the use of the priest officiating at the altar.

Altar-carpet (al'tér-kár-pet), n. Same as Altar-cloth.

Altar-cloth (al'tér-kloth), n. The cloth that covers the altar, and hangs down in front, the portion hanging down in front being called the antependium, and that which covers the top the superfrontal.

Altar-dues (al'tér-dús), n. pl. Same as Altarage, 1.

Altar-fire (al'tér-fir), n. Fire on an altar.

Altar-frontal (al'tér-front-al), n. Same as Antependium.

Altar-hearse (al'tér-hérs), n. A term sometimes applied to the frame supporting a country were to be always a subject rather of alternation than enjoyment. Burke.

Alter ego (al'tér é'gò). [L.] Another or second I; another self: a title sometimes applied to a person who has full powers to act for another, as to a Spanish viceroy when exercising regal power. It was applied to the crown-prince at Naples when he was appointed vicar-general during an insurrection in July, 1820.

Alterity (al-tér'ti-ti). [L. alter, another.] State or quality of being another, or different. [Rare.]

Your outness is but the feeling of otherness (alterity) rendered tentative, or alterity visually represented. Coloridge.

Altern (al'térn). [L. alternus, from alter, another.] 1. Acting by turns; alternate.

The greater (light) to have rule by day,
The less by night, altern. Milton.

2. In crystallography, exhibiting on two parts, an upper and a lower part, faces which alternate among themselves, but which, when the two parts are compared, correspond with each other.—Altern base, in trigon, a term used in distinction from the true base. Thus, in oblique triangles, the true base is the sum of the sides, in which case the difference of the sides is the altern base; or inversely, when the true base is the difference of the sides, the sum of the sides is the altern base.

Alternary (al-tér-na-ri). [L. alternus, from alter, another.] The state of being alternate; performance by turns. [Rare.]

The alternary of rhymes in a stanza gives a variety that may support the poet, without the aid of music, to a greater length. Milford.

Alternat (al-tér-nal). a. Alternative. [Rare.]

Alternally (al-tér-nal-li). adv. By turns. [Rare.]

Their men obeyed
Alternately both generals' commands. May.

Alternant (al-tér-nant). a. Alternating; specifically, in geom. composed of alternate layers, as some rocks.

Alternat (al-tér-ná). [Fr. from L. alternus, alternatus, to alternate.] In diplomacy, a right in virtue of which several states, in order to preserve the equality between them, take each in turn the first place; for example, in the signature of treaties.

Alternat (al-tér-ná). [L. alternus, from alter, another.] 1. Being by turns; following one another in succession of time or place; hence, reciprocal.

And bid alternate passions fall and rise. Pope.

Specifically, in bot. (a) placed on opposite sides of an axis on a different level; as, alternate leaves. (b) Placed between other bodies of the same or different whorls, as in an umbellifer, where the stemlets are alternate with, that is between, the petals.—2. Belonging to a series between every pair in which a member of another series intervenes; having one intervening between each pair: every second; as, only the alternate lines should be read; the odd numbers form one series of alternate numerals, the even numbers another.—3. Consisting of alternate parts or members, proceeding by alternation; as, an alternate series; alternate rhyming; alternate proportion.—Alternate angles, in geom. the internal angles made by two lines with a third, on opposite sides of it. If the two lines are parallel, the alternate angles are equal. Thus, if the parallels AB, CD be cut by the line EF, the angles AGE, GHD, as also the angles BGH and GHC, are called alternate angles.—Alternate proportion, the equal proportion that subsists between the alternate members of the pairs of a series of proportionals. Thus, if a : b :: c : d; then, by alternate proportion, a : c :: b : d.—Alternate quarters, in Aer. the first and fourth quarters, and the second and third, which are usually of the same nature.—Alternate generation, in zool. that modification of generation by which the young do not resemble their parent, but their grand-parent or some remote ancestor: called also Heterogenesis, Metagenesis, and Xenogenesis. See HETEROGENESIS.

Alternate (al-tér-nát). [L. alternus, from alter, another.] 1. That which happens by turns with something else; vicissitude. [Rare.]

Rais'd in pleasure, or repos'd in ease, Grateful alternates of substantial peace. Prior.

2. In American Presb. Ch. one who takes the place of another in performing duty; a substitute.

Alternate (al'tér-nát or al-tér-nát). [L. alternus, from alter, another.] 1. To perform by turns, or in succession.

Who in their course
Melodious hymns about the sovereign throne
Alternate all night long. Milton.

2. To cause to succeed or follow one another in time or place reciprocally; to interchange reciprocally.

The most high God . . . alternates the disposition of good and evil. Oh. Crav.

Alternate (al'tér-nát or al-tér-nát). [L. alternus, from alter, another.] 1. To follow one another in time or place reciprocally: often followed by with; as, the flood and ebb tides alternate with each other. 'Different species alternating with each other.' Kirwan.

Rage, shame, and grief alternate in his breast. F. Phillips.

Alternately (al-tér-nát-li). adv. In an alternate manner: (a) in reciprocal succession; by turns, so that each is succeeded by that which it succeeds, in the same way as night follows day and day follows night. (b) With the omission or intervention of one between each pair; as, read the lines alternately; in French prosody male and female rhymes follow one another in couplets alternately.—Alternately pinnate, in bot. a term used when the leaflets of a pinnate leaf are placed on the one side of a common petiole, opposite the spaces on the other side.

Alternateness (al-tér-nát-nes). [L. alternus, from alter, another.] The state or quality of being alternate, or of following in succession.

Alternation (al-tér-ná-shon). [L. alternus, from alter, another.] 1. The act of alternating, or state of being alternate; the reciprocal succession of things in time or place; the act of following and being followed in succession; as, we observe the alternation of day and night, cold and heat, summer and winter.—2. In math. (a) the different changes or alterations of orders in numbers; called more commonly Permutation. (b) Alternate proportion. See under ALTERNATE.—3. In church ritual, the response of the congregation speaking alternately with the minister.—Alternation of generation. See ALTERNATE under ALTERNATE.

Alternative (al-tér-na-tiv). [Fr. alternatif.] 1. Offering a choice or possibility of one of two things.

The conscience of mankind, and the voice alike of philosophy and of religion, reject with equal horror his (J. S. Mill's) alternative solution of the origin of evil, that the Creator of the world is either the author of evil or the slave of it. Ed. Rev.

2. Alternate; reciprocal. Holland.—3. In bot. applied to the sätivation or arrangement of the flower-buds of plants, where the inner whorl alternates with the outer.

Alternative (al-tér-na-tiv). [Fr. alternatif.] 1. Offering a choice or possibility of one of two things, so that if one is taken the other must be left, or a possibility of one of two things, so that if one is false the other must be true. The things in question are also called alternatives, and in strictness the word cannot be applied to more than two things, and when one thing only is offered for choice, it is said there is no alternative.

Between these alternatives there is no middle ground. Cranch.

Alternatively (al-tér-na-tiv-li). adv. In an alternative manner; in a manner that admits the choice or possibility of one out of two things.

Alternativeness (al-tér-na-tiv-nes). [L. alternus, from alter, another.] The quality or state of being alternative.

Althaea (al-thé'a). [Gr. althaia, from altho, to heal.] A genus of plants, nat. order Malvaceae, including the hollyhock (A. rosea), and the marsh-mallow (A. officinalis). The so-called A. frutes of the gardens does not belong to the genus, but is a Hibiscus (H. syriacus).

Althein, Altheine (al-thé'in). [n. ($C_7H_8O_8$, or $C_7H_8O_9$).] A white crystallizable substance contained in the root of the mallow (Althaea officinalis) and asparagus; asparagin (which see).

Although (al-thó'). conj. [Al and though; comp. albeit. See THOUGH.] Grant all this; be it so; allow all; suppose that; admit all that; notwithstanding.—Although, Though. These words approach very nearly in meaning. Although is perhaps the stronger and more pronounced, bringing the adversative proposition into greater prominence. It is, therefore, generally preferred to commence a sentence.

Although all shall be offended, yet will not I. Mark xiv. 18.

The sound of love makes your soft heart afraid,
And guard itself, though but a child invade. Waller.

Altiloquent (al-tíl'ò-kwens). [See ALTILOQUENT.] Lofty speech; pompous language. Bailey.

Altiloquent (al-tíl'ò-kwent). [L. altus, high, and loquens, loquens, ppr. of loquor, to speak.] High-sounding; pompous in language. Ash.

Altimeter (al-tim'é-ter). [L. altus, high, and Gr. metron, measure.] An instrument for taking altitudes by geometrical principles, as a quadrant, sextant, or theodolite.

Altimetry (al-tim'é-ri). [n. The art of ascertaining altitudes by means of an altimeter, and by trigonometrical principles without actual mensuration.]

Altincoar (al-tín'kòr). [See TINCAL.] Crude borax, employed in refining metals; tincal (which see).

Altiscope (al'ti-akòp). [n. (L. altus, high, and Gr. skopos, to look at.) An instrument consisting of an arrangement of lenses and mirrors in a vertical telescopic tube, by means of which a person is able to overlook objects intervening between himself and the object he desires to see. When the sections of the tube are extended, the view is received upon an upper mirror placed at an angle of 45° and reflected thence down the tube to a lower mirror, where it is seen by the observer.

Altisonant, Altisonous (al-tis'ò-nant, al-tis'ò-nus). [L. altus, high, and sonans, sounding, from sonus, sound.] High-sounding; lofty or pompous, as language. 'Altisonant phrases.' Keely.

Altisonant (al-tis'ò-nant). [L. altus, high, and tono, to thunder.] Thundering from on high; high-thundering. [Rare and poetical.]

Altitude (al'ti-túd). [n. (L. altitudo—altus, high, and tudo, a common termination denoting state, condition, or manner.) 1. Space extended upward; height; the elevation of an object above its foundation, the ground, or a given level; or the elevation of one object above another; as, the altitude of a mountain or column; the altitude of a cloud, or of a bird above a tree.—2. The elevation of a point, or star, or other object above the horizon, measured by the arc of a vertical intercepted between such point and the horizon. It is either apparent or true. Apparent altitude is that which appears by observations made at any place on the surface of the earth; true altitude, that which results by correcting the apparent for refraction, parallax, and dip of the horizon.—3. Highest point or degree.

He did it to please his mother, and to be partly proud; which he is, even to the altitude of his virtue. Shak.

4. Elevation of spirit, especially from liquor; haughty air: in this sense generally used in the plural.

The man of law began to get into his altitudes. Sir W. Scott.

—Accessible altitude, the altitude of an object whose base we can have access to, so as to measure the distance between it and the station from which the measure is to be taken.—Inaccessible altitude, the altitude of an object whose base cannot be approached.—Refraction of altitude, an arc of a vertical circle, by which the true altitude of a heavenly body is increased, on account of refraction.—Parallax of altitude. See PARALLAX.—Altitude, or elevation of the pole, the arc of the meridian intercepted between the pole and the horizon. It is equal to the latitude of the place.—Meridian altitude, an arc of the meridian between the horizon and any star or point on the meridian.

Altitudinarian (al'ti-tu-di-nar'i-an), a. Aspiring. Coleridge. [Rare]

Altivolant (al-ti-vol-ant), a. [L. altus, high, and volans, flying.] Flying high. Bosley. [Rare]

Alto (al'to or al'to), [It. from L. altus, high.] High; a common element in terms in music and art, derived from the Italian, as, alto-risante, alto-risore.

Alto (al'to or al'to), a. [So called from being higher than the tenor, to which in old music the melody was assigned.] Is music, (a) Same as Contralto. (b) The instrument called in England the tenor-violin, and by the Italians the viola.

Alto-claf (al'to-klef), a. In music, the C-clef, placed upon the third line of the staff, in order that the notes proper for the alto voice may be conveniently represented.

Alto-fagottista (al'to-fag-ot'ta or al'to-fag-ot'ta), An old musical instrument played with a reed and mouthpiece similar to a clarinet.

Altogether (al-tu-goth'er), adv. [All and together.] Wholly; entirely; completely, quite.

Every man at his best state is altogether vanity.

Ps. xciii. 5.

Altometer (al-tom-et-er), a. Same as Altimeter (which see).

Alto-relievo (al'to-re-liv'vo), a. Same as Alto-rilievo (which see).

Alto-rilievo (al'to-re-liv'vo), [It. See ALTO and RILIEVO.] High relief, a term applied in regard to sculptured figures to express that they stand out boldly from the background, projecting more than half their thickness without being entirely detached, thus a piece of sculpture is said to be an alto-rilievo or in alto-rilievo. In mezzo-rilievo, or petash alum has the formula $KAlSO_4 + 12H_2O$. It is produced by adding potassium sulphate or chloride to crude aluminium sulphate obtained from alum shale by the action of sulphuric acid, or by roasting shale which contains alumina and pyrites, whereby the sulphur of the latter is oxidized to sulphuric acid, which, acting on the alumina, produces aluminium sulphate. Alum crystallizes in beautiful octahedra which are white, transparent, and very astringent. Alum is of great use in medicine and the arts. In medicine it is used as an astringent—internally, in hemoptoe, diarrhoea, and dysentery; externally, as a styptic applied to bleeding vessels, and as an escharotic in the arts it is used in dyeing, as a mordant to fix colours, in making candles, for hardening the tallow; in tanning, for restoring the cohesion of skins, in baking it is employed to whiten bread. It occurs in a native state only in small quantities.

Alum (al'um), v.t. To steep in or impregnate with a solution of alum.

Alumen (al'men), a. [L.] Alum (which see).

Alumina (al'mi-na), a. (Al_2O_3) The oxide of aluminium, the most abundant of the earths. It is widely diffused over the globe in the shape of clay, loam, and other similar substances; the adamantine spar, the ruby, corundum, and sapphires are alumina nearly pure and crystallized. In these forms alumina is next to the diamond, the hardest substance known. Its great value in the arts depends on its affinity for vegetable coloring matters and animal fibres. It forms the base of the lakes in dyeing, and acts also as a mordant.

Aluminia (al'mi-na), a. Same as Alumina.

Aluminiferous (al'mi-nif'er-us), a. Containing or affording alum, alumina, or aluminium.

Aluminiform (al'mi-nif'orm), a. Having the form of alum, alumina, or aluminium.

Aluminate (al'mi-nat), a. Syzyous sulphate of alumina, a mineral that occurs in small rounded or reniform masses. Its color is snow-white or yellowish white.

Aluminium, Aluminum (al'mi-ni-um), a. Chemical sym. Al. At wt. = 27.3, sp. gr. 2.6 nearly. The metallic base of alumina, a white metal with a bluish tinge, and a lustre somewhat resembling, but far inferior to, that of silver. It does not occur native, but is extracted for the purposes of commerce from a mineral called cryolite, found in great abundance in Greenland. From its lightness, hardness, ductility, sonorosity, non-liability to rust, and resistance to the action of sulphuretted hydrogen, it is largely employed in the preparation of alloys and for the manufacture of articles for which silver was formerly employed. — Aluminium gold, an alloy of 10 parts of aluminium to 90 of copper, of a pale gold colour, harder than bronze, and susceptible of a fine polish. Its hardness and tenacity peculiarly adapt it for journals and bearings.

Aluminous (al'mi-nus), a. Pertaining to or containing alum or alumina, or partaking of the same properties, as, aluminous minerals or waters.

Alumiah (al'mi-ah), a. Having the nature of alum, somewhat resembling alum.

Alumnus (a-lum'nu), a. pl. Alumni (a-lum'i-ni), [L. alumnus, a nursing, disciple, from ale, to nourish.] A pupil, one educated at a seminary or university, a graduate or undergraduate of a university, regarded as his alma mater.

Alum-rock (al'm-rok), a. Same as Alum-stone.

Alum-root (al'm-rok), a. A name given to the astringent root of several plants, as Heuchera americana.

Alum-schist, Alum-slate (al'm-shist, al'm-slat), a. A thin bedded brittle rock of a grayish, bluish, or iron-black colour, and often possessed of a glossy shining lustre. It is chiefly composed of silica and alumina, and from it is obtained the largest part of the alum of commerce.

Alum-stone (al'm-sdon), a. The siliceous sub-sulphate of alumina and potash; a mineral of a grayish or yellowish white colour, found at Tolfa in Italy, in secondary rocks.

Alunogen (al'un-o-jen), a. [Fr. alun, alum, and Gr. ginomai, produce.] Native sulphate of aluminium, consisting of 36.06 sulphuric acid, 18.06 alumina, and 46.66 water, occurring in fine capillary fibres. It is found in volcanic scistates, in clays, and feldspar rocks containing pyrites, and as an efflorescence on the walls of mines and quarries.

Alurel (al'er), a. [Fr. allure, pace, gait, from aller, to go.] 1 An alley, a walk. — 2 A passage, gangway, or gallery in a building. — 3 The new alure between the king's chamber and the cold chapel. Brady. — 4 The side pavement of a street.

The sides of every street were covered with fresh alures of marble.

A-mornings (a-mō'ningz), adv. [Prefix a, on, and mornings, which here is probably the adverbial genitive, not the plural.] In the mornings.

Such pleasant walks into the woods
A-mornings. Beau. & Fl.

Amorosa (am-ō-rō'sa), n. [It.] An amorous or wanton woman.

I took them for amorosas, and violators of the bounds of modesty. Sir T. Herbert.

Amoroso (am-ō-rō'sō), n. [It. from amor, love.] A man enamoured; a lover.

It is a gibe which an heathen puts upon an amoroso, that wastes his whole time in dalliance upon his mistress, viz. that love is an idle man's business. Ep. Hacket.

Amoroso (am-ō-rō'sō), adv. [It.] In music, tenderly; amorously; in a manner expressive of love: resembling afettuoso, but somewhat bolder and more spirited.

Amorous (am-ō-rus), a. [Fr. amoureux, It. amoroso, L. L. amorous, L. amor, love.] 1. Inclined to love; having a propensity to love, or to sexual enjoyment; loving; fond; as, an amorous disposition. 'So amorous is Nature of whatever she produces.' Dryden. 'Princes amorous of their chiefs.' Chapman. 2. In love; enamoured: usually with of, formerly sometimes with on.

The amorous master owned her potent eyes. Prior.
Sure my brother is amorous on Hero. Shak.

3. Pertaining or relating to love; produced by love; indicating love. 'Amorous delight.' Milton. 'Amorous airs.' Waller.—SYN. Loving, fond, tender, passionate.

Amorously (am-ō-rus-ly), adv. In an amorous manner; fondly; lovingly.

Amorousness (am-ō-rus-ness), n. The quality of being amorous or inclined to love, or to sexual pleasure; fondness; lovingness.

Amorpha (a-mor'fā), n. [Gr. a, neg. and morphē, form.] A genus of plants, nat. order Leguminosae; bastard indigo. The species are shrubs of moderate size, having pendulous branches and long clusters of blue-violet flowers. They are natives of America. A. fruticosa, the commonest species in European gardens, was introduced into Britain in 1724. The inhabitants of Carolina are said at one time to have made a coarse sort of indigo from its young shoots.

Amorphism (a-mor'fiz-m), n. State of being amorphous or without shape; specifically, a state of being without crystallization, even in the minutest particles, as in glass, opal, &c.

Amorphote (a-mor'fē-tē), n. pl. [Gr. amorphōtes, formless—a, without, and morphē, shape.] In astron. stars not formed into any constellation, and so not constituting a portion of any symmetrical figure.

Amorphous (a-mor'fus), a. [Gr. amorphos—a, neg. and morphē, form.] 1. Having no determinate form; of irregular shape. Xirwan.—2. Having no regular structure; specifically, being without crystallization, even in the minutest particles, as glass and opal are amorphous.—3. Of no particular kind or character; formless; characterless; clumsy.

Scientific treatises . . . are not seldom rude and amorphous in style. Hare.

Amorphozoa (a-mor'fō-zō'a), n. pl. [Gr. a, without, morphē, shape, and zōon, a living creature.] Lit. shapeless animals; specifically, a term applied to some of the lower groups of animals, as the sponges and their allies, which have no regular symmetrical structure. Blainville.

Amorphy (a-mor'fī), n. [See AMORPHOUS.] Irregularity of form; deviation from a determinate shape. 'His epidemical diseases being fastidiously, amorphy, and oscitation.' Swift. [Rare.]

A-morrow (a-mor'ō), adv. See A-MORWE.
Amort (a-mor't), a. A word used only in the phrase all amort=half-dead, depressed, spiritless, regardless. Nares thinks the phrase a corruption of a-la-mort, but it is more probably the adv. all and the Norm. amort, dead.

How fares my Kate? What, sweeting, all amort? Shak.

She danced along with vague, regardless eyes, all amort. Keats.

satio, Fr. amortissement, mortmain.] 1. The act or right of alienating lands or tenements to a corporation in mortmain.—2. The extinction of debt, especially by a sinking fund.

Amortise (a-mor'tīz), v. t. pret. & pp. amortized; ppr. amortizing. [Norm. Fr. amortiser; L. L. amortizare, to sell in mortmain—L. ad, to, and mors, mortis, death. See MORTMAIN.] 1. In law, to alienate in mortmain, that is, to sell to a corporation, sole or aggregate, ecclesiastical or temporal, and their successors. See MORTMAIN.—2. To extinguish, as a debt, by means of a sinking fund.

A-morwe, adv. On the morrow.

A-morwe, when the day began to spring,
Uprose our hosts. Canterbury Tales.

Amotion (a-mō'shon), n. [L. amotio, from amoveo, amotum. See AMOVE.] 1. Removal; ejection.—2. In law, deprivation of possession or office; the removal of an officer or member of a corporation.

The cause of his amotion is twice mentioned by the Oxford antiquary. T. Warton.

Amount (a-mōunt'), v. i. [O. Fr. amonter, to advance, ascend, increase; Norm. Fr. amont, upwards, up the stream—a, to, and monter, to mount, from mont, L. mons, montis, a hill. Comp. anale, from L. ad, to, and valis, a valley.] 1. To get up; ascend; and hence, to depart. 'When the larks doth fyrt amount on high.' H. Peacham.

So up he rose, and thence amounted straight. Spenser.

2. To reach a certain amount by an accumulation of particulars; to come in the aggregate or whole.

Thy substance, valued at the highest rate,
Cannot amount unto a hundred marks. Shak.

3. To rise, reach, or extend, in effect, substance, influence, or the like; to be equivalent.

The errors of young men are the ruin of business; but the errors of aged men amount but to this, that more might have been done or sooner. Bacon.

[Swift joins the pp. of this verb with was, giving it the appearance of a transitive verb. 'Whose number was now amounted to 300.']

Amount (a-mōunt'), n. 1. The sum total of two or more particular sums or quantities; the aggregate; as, the amount of 7 and 9 is 16.—2. The effect, substance, or result; the sum; as, the evidence, in amount, comes to this.

Amour (a-mōr'), n. [Fr. from L. amor, love.] An unlawful connection in love; a love intrigue; an affair of gallantry.—Amour propre, self-love; self-conceit; vanity.

Amourette (am-ō-ret'), n. Same as Amoret.

Amoval (a-mōv'al), n. Total removal.

Amoval (a-mōv'al), v. t. [L. amoveo—a, away, and moveo, to move.] 1. In law, to remove, especially from a post or station.

Coroners may be amoved for reasonable cause. Sir M. Hale.

2. To move; to excite; to affect.

At her so piteous cry was much amoved
Her champion stout. Spenser.

Ampeo (am'pāk), n. An East Indian tree, which yields a highly odoriferous resin, and the leaves of which are used to medicate baths. It is a species of Xanthoxylon.

Ampelides (am-pel'idē), n. pl. [See AMPELIS.] The chattering, a family of insectivorous or perching birds, having a wide gape, short broad and slightly arched bill, notched at the tip, and sharp hooked claws. Most of them inhabit tropical America, and several are distinguished for the gorgeousness of their plumage.

Ampelides (am-pel'idē'sē), n. pl. [From Gr. ampelis, ampelos, a vine.] The name given by Endlicher to the natural order of plants called Vitaceae (which see).

Ampelinae (am-pel'inē), n. pl. A sub-family of birds of the family Ampelides or chattering. See AMPELIDÆ, AMPELIS.

Ampelis (am-pel-is), n. [Gr. kind of singing bird.] A genus of perching birds, forming the type of the family Ampelides or chattering, as well as of the sub-family or group Ampelinae. This genus includes the Bohemian wax-wing or waxen chattering, the only chattering that visits Britain.

Ampelite (am-pel-it'), n. [Gr. ampeleus, a kind of earth with which the vine was sprinkled to preserve it from worms—ampeleus, a vine.] A species of black earth abounding in pyrites, so named from having been used to kill insects in vines. The name is also applied to cannel-coal and to some kinds of schist.

pharyngo-brachial fishes, with gelatinous dorsal chord, pulsating vessels in place of the heart, and a brachial sac in the cavity of the oesophagus. The amphioxus is the type.

Amphioxus (am-fī-oks'us), n. [Gr amphi, on both sides, and oxus, sharp, because the animal is sharp at both ends.] An anomalous genus of fishes, otherwise called Branchiostoma, and containing only the common lancelet (Amphioxus lanceolatus or Branchiostoma lanceolatum) and another species. See BRANCHIOSTOMA.

Amphipneust (am-fīp-nūst), n. One of the amphipneusta (which see).

Amphipneusta (am-fīp-nū'sta), n. pl. [Gr. amphi, in two ways, and pneō, to breathe.] A former name of a sub-order of tailed amphibia, retaining their gills through life. See URODELA.

Amphipod, Amphipode (am-fī-pod, am-fī-pōd), n. One of the amphipoda (which see).
Amphipoda (am-fī-pōd'-a), n. pl. [Gr. amphi, on both sides, and pous, podes, a foot.] An order of the sessile-eyed mala-

1. Shore-jumper (Orchestoidea litoralis). 2. Portion of Orchestoidea to show the respiratory organs as a s.

costracan crustaceans. The bodies of these animals are compressed laterally and curved upon the sides; the eyes are immovable, and their feet are directed partly forwards and partly backwards. The respiratory organs consist of membranous vesicles attached to the bases of the thoracic limbs. Many of the species are found in springs and rivulets, others are met with in salt water. The sand-hopper and shore-jumper are examples.

Amphipodous (am-fī-pōd-us), a. Of or pertaining to the Amphipoda.

Amphiprostyle, Amphiprostyle (am-fīpro-stil), n. [Gr amphi, on both sides, and prostyle, having pillars in front—pro, before, and stylē, a column.] Lit. having pillars both in front and behind. In arch architecture having the form of an ancient Greek or Roman oblong rectangular temple, with a prostyle or portico on each of its ends or fronts, but with no columns on its sides or flanks.

Amphisarca (am-fī-sār-ka), n. [Gr amphi, on both sides, and sarka, sarkos, flesh.] In bot a compound, many-celled, indurated, superior fruit, with a woody or indurated shell enclosing an internal pulp, as seen in the baobab.

Amphisbena (am-fī-bē-na), n. [Gr. amphibaina—amphi, on both sides, and bainō, to go, from the belief that the animal moved with either end foremost.] A genus of serpentine, limbless reptiles, family Amphisbenedae, order Lacertilia, with the head small, smooth, and blunt, the nostrils small, the eyes minute and blackish, and the mouth furnished with small teeth. The body is cylindrical, destitute of scales, and divided into numerous annular segments; the tail obtuse, and scarcely to be distinguished from the head, whence the belief that it moved equally well with either end foremost. There are several species. A. fuliginosa, black, with white spots, is found in Guinea and Surinam; and A. alba, the largest species, about 21 inches long, reddish-brown above and white below, is found in Surinam and Brazil, generally in ant-hills. They feed on ants and earthworms, and were formerly, but erroneously, deemed poisonous, whence Milton classes it among the most noxious reptiles.

Amphisbena fuliginosa.

Complicated monsters . . .
Scorpion, and asp, and amphisbena dire,
Cerastra horned, hydras, and elopse drear,
And dipsas. Paradise Lost, b. x.

—Aquatic amphisbena, a name formerly sometimes given to the common hair-worm (Gordius aquaticus), which, however, has no connection with the amphisbenas proper, but is one of the nematoid worms, or Nematelmia, class Scolecida. See GORDIUS and GORDIACA.

Amphisbena (am-fī-bē-na), n. pl. An order of lacertian reptiles, of which the genus Amphisbena is the type.

Amphisbenedae (am-fī-bē-nē-dē), n. pl. That family of the Amphisbenas which includes the genus Amphisbena.

Amphisbian (am-fī-shī-an), n. One of the Amphisbians (which see).

Amphisbi (am-fī-shī), n. pl. [Gr. amphi, on both sides, and bi, shadow.] In geog. the inhabitants of the inter-tropical regions, whose shadows at noon in one part of the year are cast to the north and in the other to the south, according as the sun is in the northern or northern signa.

Amphisle (am-fī-sī-lē), n. A genus of aca-thopterygious fishes, in which the back is plated, and the first dorsal fin is placed quite at the extremity of the body, and produced into a long and strong spine. It belongs to the family Fistulariidae (Aulostomidae), or sea-snipes. It is closely allied to, and was included in, the genus Centrus by Linnaeus.

Amphistomous (am-fī-stōm-us), a. [Gr. amphi, on both sides, and stoma, a mouth.] A term applied to certain entozoa having a cup-shaped mouth at each extremity, by which they adhere to the intestines of the animals in which they are parasitic.

Amphitheatral (am-fī-thē-a-tral), a. Pertaining to or resembling an amphitheatre.

Amphitheatre (am-fī-thē-a-tēr), n. [Gr amphi, about, and theatron, theatre, from theaomai, to see or look.]

Amphitheatre at Verona.

1 An ancient Roman edifice of an oval form, having a central area encompassed with rows of seats, rising higher as they receded from the centre, on which people used to sit to view the combats of gladiators and of wild beasts, and other sports. The ancient theatre was nearly semicircular in shape, with its rows of seats fronting the stage: the amphitheatre is frequently described as a double theatre, as consisting of two such semicircles or halves joined together, the spaces allotted to their orobates becoming the inner inclosure, arena, or, as it was called, arena, from being generally covered with sand. It is not quite correct to say, however, that an amphitheatre was formed by two semicircles, since it was always elliptical in form. The arena was surrounded by a wall about 15 feet high, so that the spectators were quite secure from the attacks of any of the wild beasts exhibited. The Colosseum at Rome is the largest of all the ancient amphitheatres, being capable of containing from 50,000 to 80,000 persons. That at Verona is one of the best examples remaining. Its dimensions are 502 feet by 401, and 98 feet high.—2 Anything resembling an amphitheatre in form, as a hollow surrounded by rising ground, in hort. a sloping disposition of shrubs and trees.

Amphitheatral, Amphitheatrical (am-fī-thē-a-trik, am-fī-thē-a-trik-al), a. Pertaining to or exhibited in an amphitheatre.

Amphitheatrical gladiators Gayton.

Amphitheatricality (am-fī-thē-a-trik-al-ty), n. In an amphitheatrical manner or form.

Amphitherium (am-fī-thēr-um), n. [Gr amphi, implying doubt, and therion, a wild beast.] A fossil insectivorous mammal of the coelites. As its remains do not furnish sufficient data to decide whether it is placental or apental, it has received this provisional name. A. Prevostii is the only species yet discovered.

Amphithura (am-fī-thēr-a), n. [Gr amphi, both, twofold, and thura, a door.] The correct spelling of the word now commonly written Amphedura (which see).

Amphitrite (am-fī-trī-tē), n. (Name of a nymph in Greek mythology, sister of Thetis and wife of Neptune.) 1 A small planet or asteroid between the orbits of Mars and Jupiter, discovered by M. Marth on the 2d March, 1864. 2 A genus of marine annelids, order Tubicolina, and class Annulata of Cuvier.

They are easily recognized by their golden-coloured setae, disposed in the form of a crown. Some of them construct and carry about with them slight, regularly conical tubes of sand, glued together by mucus exuded from the skin.

Amphitropal, Amphitropous (am-fī-trop-al, am-fī-trop-us), a. [Gr. amphi, round, and tropō, to turn.] In bot applied to an ovule curved upon itself so that both ends (the forasinal and chalazal) are brought near to each other with the hilum in the middle.

Amphitropal Ovule.

Amphitype (am-fī-tīp), n. [Gr amphi, both, and typos, an impression.] In photog. a process discovered by Sir John Herschel, by which light produces either a positive or a negative. The paper is prepared by a solution of ferro-tartrate or of ferro-citrate of protoxide or peroxide of mercury, followed by a solution of ammonio-tartrate or ammonio-citrate. On exposure to the camera a negative is produced of a rich brown tint, which fades in the dark, but may be restored as a black positive by immersing it in a solution of nitrate of mercury, and ironing it with a hot iron.

Amphiuma (am-fī-ū-ma), n. [Gr. amphi, both, and huma, from hūō, to wet, to water.] A genus of amphibians which frequent the lakes and stagnant waters of North America. The adults retain the clefts at which the gills of the tadpole projected. The body is of great length.

Amphiumides (am-fī-ū-mī-dē), n. pl. A family of tailed amphibians distinguished by a small brachial aperture on each side, within which are the brachial arches with small laminae. They approach, in respect of their respiratory apparatus, the amphipneusta or true amphibia, in which the external gills are persistent. The genus Amphiuma (which see) is the type.

Amphora (am-fō-ra), n. pl. Amphorae (am-fō-rē) [L. amphora, Gr amphoreus, a short-necked form of amphiphoreus—amphi, on both sides, and phorō, to carry, from its two handles.] Among the Greeks and Romans, a vessel, usually tall and narrow, with two handles or ears and a narrow neck, and generally ending in a sharp point below for being inserted in a stand or in the ground, used for holding wine, oil, honey, and the like. The amphorae were commonly made of earthenware, but Homer mentions amphorae of gold and stone; the Egyptians had them of brass; and glass vessels of this form have been found at Pompeii. The most common use of the amphora was for keeping wine. The stop-was covered with pitch or gypsum, and, among the Romans, the title of the wine was put on the outside, the date of the vintage being marked by the names of the comets then in sight. The amphora was also the name of a fixed measure, the Greek amphora being equal to 2 gallons, 7 3/8 pints imperial measure, and the Roman amphora two-thirds of this, or 6 gallons, 7 5/7 pints imperial. The amphora is often introduced in architecture as an ornament to sarcophagi.

Amphora.

Amphora (am'fō-rā), a. Pertaining to or resembling an amphora.

Amphoric (am'fō-rik), a. In acoustics, emitted from a cavity in the lungs not filled with fluid, and so giving a sound like that produced by blowing into an empty decanter; an. amphoric resonance or respiration.

Amphoterio (am-to-ter'io), a. (Gr amphoterio, both.) Partly the one and partly the other. Smart.

Ample (am'pl), a. [Fr. ample, L. amplus—prolus est, emb (=Gr ampli, on both sides), and root of plus, to fill, comp. double.] 1. Large in dimensions; of great size, extent, capacity, or bulk; wide, spacious; extended; an. ample room. 'Nature's ample lap.' Thomson.

All the people in that ample house
Did to that image bow their humble knees.
Spenser.

2. Fully sufficient for any purpose or for some purpose intended; abundant; liberal; copious. plentiful, an. ample provision for the table, ample justice.

An ample number of horses had been purchased in England with the public money. Macaulay.

3. Not brief or contracted; extended, diffuse. an. an ample narrative. — Amplis, Copious, Plentiful. Amplis has reference to the sufficiency of the supply for every need, copious carries with it the idea of un-failingness of supply, while plentiful indicates largeness of quantity in actual possession, an. ample stores or resources, a copious supply of materials; a plentiful harvest. — Amplis spacious, extensive, wide, capacious, abundant, plentiful, plentiful, liberal, copious, rich.

Ampliatant (am-plā'tant), a. [L. ampliatant, ampliatant, pp. of ampliator, to embrace.] Embracing; clasping; especially, in bot encircling or clasping the stem of a plant, an. ampliatant tendrils.

Ampleness (am-pli-ness), n. The state of being ample, largeness, sufficiency; abundance.

Amplification (am-pli-kā'shon), n. [L. amplificatio, amplificatio, to embrace.] An embrace. 'An humble amplification of those sacred feet.' By Hall.

Ampliflexion (am-pli-flek'shon), a. [L. ampliflexus, embraced—amb about, and platus, to twist—and amb, a stem.] In bot nearly surrounding or embracing the stem, as the base of a leaf. Peperomia ambiflexum and Isatis holoceras have ampliflexion leaves.

Ampliflexion Leaf
(Isatis Holoceras).

Amplify (am-pli-ā), v. t. pret. & pp. amplified, pp. amplifying [L. amplifio, amplifio, to make more ample or greater; to enlarge, to extend. 'To maintain and amplify the external possessions of your empire.' Udall.

Amplification (am-pli-kā'shon), n. 1. Enlargement, amplification, diffuseness.

Others maintain that not of an amplification, but ought to be restrained and interpreted in the widest sense.

2. In law amplis a delaying to pass sentence; a postponement of a decision to obtain further evidence.

Amplifying (am-pli-ā-ing), a. Enlarging; increasing, specifically, in metaph. adding to what is involved in the meaning of the subject of a proposition; synthetic said of judgments.

All bodies possess power of attraction 'is an amplifying judgment, because we can think of bodies without thinking of attraction as one of their immediate primary attributes. But, if our knowledge of any object were complete, we should conceive it invested with all its attributes, and so a synthetic judgment would be required.

Amplification (am-pli-ā-kā'shon), v. t. [L. amplifio, amplifio, to enlarge—amplis, wide, and fio, factum, to make.] To enlarge in dimensions, to amplify.

Amplification (am-pli-ā-kā'shon), n. 1. The act of amplifying or enlarging in dimensions, enlargement, extension. 'Amplification of the visible figure of a known object.' Reid. 2. In rhet. diffusive description or discussion, exaggerated representation; copious argument, intended to present the subject in every view or in the strongest light, diffuse narrative, or a dilating upon all the particulars of a subject, a description given in more words than are necessary, or an illustration by various examples and proofs.

Amplificative (am-pli-ā-kā'tiv), a. Serving or tending to amplify, amplificatory.

Amplificatory (am-pli-ā-kā'tō-ri), a. Serving to amplify or enlarge, amplificative.

Amplifier (am-pli-ā-fer), n. One who amplifies or enlarges. 'That great city Rome, whereof they (Romulus and Remus) were the first amplifiers.' Boile.

There are amplifiers who can extend half a dozen thin thoughts over a whole folio.

Amplify (am-pli-ā), v. t. pret. & pp. amplified, pp. amplifying [Fr. amplifier, to enlarge—L. amplis, ample, and fio, to make.] 1. To make more ample, larger, more extended, fuller, more copious, and the like; to enlarge.

All concaves . . . do amplify the sound at the tuning out.

'Tristram and Crispin' was written by a Lombard author, but much amplified by our English translator.

2. In rhet. to enlarge in discussion or by manner of representation, to treat copiously, so as to present the subject in every view, and in the strongest light.

I would not willingly seem to savor the present epoch, by amplifying the diligence and true judgment of those virtuous who have labored in the vineyard.

Amplify (am-pli-ā), v. t. 1. To grow or become ample or more ample.

Scarcely was the way at first, without light,
But further it did further amplify.

2. To enlarge by representation or description; to speak largely or copiously, to be diffuse in argument or description; to dilate upon: often followed by on, an, to amplify on the several topics of discourse.

Homage amplifies, not invents.
When you affect to amplify on the former branches of a discourse, you will often lay a necessity on yourself of contracting the latter.

Amplitude (am-pli-tūd), n. [L. amplitudo, from amplus, large.] 1. State of being ample, an. (a) largeness of dimensions; extent of surface or space; an. the amplitude of the earth.

The cathedral of Lincoln . . . is a magnificent structure, proportionable to the amplitude of the diocese.

(b) Largeness, in a figurative sense, an. extent of capacity or intellectual powers; extent of means or resources. 'Amplitude of mind.' Milton.

It is in the power of princes and states to add amplitude and greatness to their kingdoms.

2. In astron. an arc of the horizon intercepted between the east or west point and the centre of the sun or star at its rising or setting. At the rising of a star the amplitude is eastern or ortive; at the setting it is western, occidentive, or occative. It is also northern or southern when north or south of the equator. The amplitude of a fixed star remains nearly the same all the year round. The sun at the solstices is at its maximum amplitude, and at the equator it has no amplitude. — Amplitude of the range of a projectile, the horizontal line subtending the path of a body thrown, or the line which measures the distance it has moved, the range. — Magnetic amplitude, the arc of the horizon between the sun or a star at rising or setting, and the east or west point of the horizon, by the compass. The difference between this and the true amplitude is the variation of the compass. Amplitude compass, an azimuth compass, whose zeros of graduation are at the east and west points, for the more ready reading of the amplitude of celestial bodies.

Amplify (am'pli), adv. In an ample manner; largely; liberally; fully; sufficiently, copiously, abundantly.

Ampul (am'pul), n. See AMPULLA.

Ampulla (am'pul-lā), n. pl. Ampullae (am'pul-lā). [L.] In Rom. entig a more or less globular bottle, usually made of glass or earthenware, rarely of more valuable materials, used for carrying oil to the bath for the purpose of anointing the body after bathing. — 2. Eccles. (a) a flask or cruet, generally of precious metal, for holding the wine and water used at the altar. See AMA. (b) A vessel for holding the consecrated oil or chrism used in various church rites and at the coronation of kings. The ampulla used at coronations in England is in the form of an eagle, of pure gold, richly chased. The famous one formerly used in France was kept at Rheims, and was reputed to have been brought from heaven by a dove for the baptism of Clovis I. It was broken at the revolution, but a fragment is said to have been preserved and used at the coronation of Charles X. Written also Am-pul. — 3. In anat. the dilated part of the membranaceous semicircular canals in the ear. — 4. In bot (a) a small membranaceous bag attached to the roots and the immersed leaves of some aquatic plants, as in the Lemna or duck-weed. (b) A term applied to the hollow flask-shaped leaves formed in certain aquatic plants, as in Utricularia (which see).

Ampullicious (am-pul-lā'shūs), a. Of or pertaining to or like an ampulla, bottle, or inflated bladder.

comfully, as it has been proved to be extremely dangerous.

Amylic (am-i'lik), a. Pertaining to amyli; derived from the radical amyli, an amylic ether. Amylic alcohol ($C_{12}H_{22}O_2$) called also hydroxy amyli a transparent colorless liquid derived from the fermentation of starch. Under the name of fusel-oil it is a product of fermentation in distillation, being contained in crude spirit, and its removal is a great object with distillers, as its presence, even in small quantity, much injures the proportion of the spirit. Amylic fermentation, a process of fermentation in starch or sugar, in which amylic alcohol is produced.

Amylin (am'i-lin), a. [See AMYL.] The insoluble portion of starch which constitutes the outer covering of the spherulites.

Amyloid (am'i-oid), a. [Amyli, and Gr. oides, likeness.] Resembling, or being of the nature of, amyli. — Amyloid degeneration, in which a change of structure by which the tissue or organ affected presents chemical characters of amyloid compounds or sometimes of albuminoid substances.

Amyloid (am'i-oid), a. In bot a semi-gelatinous substance, analogous to starch, met with in some seeds, which becomes yellow in water after having been coloured blue by iodine.

Amyrallism (am'i-rall-izm), a. See the doctrine of universal grace, as explained by Amyrallus or Amyrald of France in the seventeenth century. He taught that God desires the happiness of all men, and that none are excluded by a divine decree but that none can obtain salvation without faith in Christ, that God refuses to raise the power of believing, though he does not grant to all his assistance to improve this power.

Amyraldist (am'i-rall-ist), a. One who believes in Amyrallism, or the doctrine of universal grace.

by the consonantal sound of y, such words do not take the form an before them; as, anachronism, a European reputation. This rule is not always followed, however, even by good writers. 'An useless waste of life.' Nearley. 'An earnest.' Congress. Sometimes the form an is used before h even in those words which have the accent on the first syllable. Byron, for example, has an Acre.

An- 1 [The same negative particle is seen in L. in-, Skr. an-, E. Goth. an-, O. H. G. un-, all denoting negation.] The full form of the Greek negative prefix, but only used where necessary to prevent hiatus (that is, before a vowel), as in anarchy. Before a consonant it becomes a-. 2 A shortened form of the prefix ana, as in anchoret, anacardium, anode. See ANA.

An' (an), conj. (See AND, if.) 1. Old English an (f); as, 'an thou wert my father as thou art will to my brother.' Beau. & Fl.—2. As if I will roar you an' were any nightingale. Shak.—An (f), if; though.

An (f) a man did need a poison now. . . . Here is a catfish wretch would sell it him. Shak.

Ana (an'a). [Same word as E. on, G. an, Goth. ana.] 1. A Greek preposition much employed as a prefix in words of Greek origin, and implying primarily up, up to, motion upward. In composition, besides having its primary sense, as in anabasis, it also denotes repetition, as in anabaptist; inversion or transposition, as in anachronism, anagram; distribution, as in analysis; parallelism, as in analogy.—2. In med. used in prescriptions to indicate an equal quantity of each, and often written aa; thus, Puls. Rhei et Zinzib., Æ 3ij = powder of rhubarb and ginger of each two drachms.

Ana (an'a). The neuter plural termination of Latin adjectives in anus, often forming an an to the names of eminent men to denote a collection of their memorable sayings—thus Scaligeriana, Johnsoniana, the sayings of Scaliger, of Johnson, or to denote a collection of anecdotes, or gossip matter, as in bohemiana. Hence, as an independent noun, books recording such sayings; the sayings themselves.

But, all his vast heart sherris-warmed
He flashed his random speeches;
Ere days, that deal in ana, swarmed
His literary leeches. Tennyson.

Anabaptism (an-a-bap'tizm), n. [See ANABAPTIST.] The doctrine or practices of the Anabaptists.

Anabaptist (an-a-bap'tist), n. [Gr. ana, again, and baptizō, a baptist.] One who holds the doctrine of the baptism of adults, or of the invalidity of infant baptism, and the necessity of rebaptism at an adult age. With this is generally associated the doctrine of baptism by immersion.

Anabaptistic, Anabaptistical (an-a-bap-tis'tik, an-a-bap-tis'tik-al), a. Relating to the Anabaptists or to their doctrines.

Anabaptistry (an-a-bap'tis-try), n. The sect, practices, or doctrine of Anabaptists. 'Anabaptistry was suppressed in Munster.' Ep. Papst. [Rare.]

Anabaptist (an'a-bap-tis'), v.t. pret. & pp. anabaptized; ppr. anabaptizing. To rebaptize.

Though some called their profound ignorances new light, they were better anabaptized into the appellation of embezzlers. Whitlock.

Anabas (an'a-bas), n. [Gr. anabas, part of second acc. of anabainō, to go up, to mount, to climb—ana, up, and bainō, to go.] A genus of fishes, the type of the family Anabasinidae (which see).

Anabasinidae, Anabatinidae (an-a-bas'i-dē, an-a-bat'i-dē), n. pl. A family of acanthopterygian fishes, remarkable for having the pharyngeal bones (or those supporting the dry land in search of pools, when deserted by the water in which it has been living. The statement that it can climb the rough stems of palm-trees is now, however, considered unworthy of credit. The Ophicephalus marginatus, another member of the family, is often seen traversing the grass during the rainy season. Many of the species are much esteemed as food.

Anabasis (an-ab'a-sis), n. [Gr. ana, up, and basis, a going, from bainō, to go.] 1. Lit. a going up; specifically, applied to the work of Xenophon descriptive of the expedition of Cyrus from Sardis, on the coast of Asia Minor, into the interior, with the view of dethroning his brother Artaxerxes, the great king of Persia, and including also an account of the retreat of the ten thousand Greek mercenaries under the leadership of Xenophon.—2. Any expedition from the coast inland, especially military. 'The anabasis of Napoleon.' De Quincey.

Anabasse (an-a-bas), n. [Fr.] A coarse kind of blanketing made in Normandy and in Holland for the African market.

Anabatinidae. See ANABASINIDÆ.

Anableps (an'a-bleps), n. [Gr. anablepō, to look up.] A genus of malscopterygian fishes, remarkable for the structure of their eyes. These project and have two pupils, and each eye appears as if double, so that the animal seems to have four eyes; but there is only one crystalline humour, one vitreous humour, and one retina. The A. tetraophthalmus inhabits the rivers of Guiana. It has a cylindrical body, a flat head, and a blunt snout. It brings forth its young alive, and in a considerable state of development.

Anabole (an-ab'ō-lē), n. [Gr. ana, up, and bollē, a throwing, from ballo, to throw.] In med. an evacuation upwards; an act by which certain matters are rejected by the mouth, including expulsion, expectoration, regurgitation, and vomiting.

Anacampeeros (an-a-kamp-se-ros), n. [Gr. anakampō, to make to turn back (from ana, back, and kampō, to bend), and erōs, love.] 1. A plant to which the ancients attributed the quality of restoring or inducing the return of the passion of love.—2. A genus of succulent, shrubby plants, nat. order Portulacaceae, natives of the Cape of Good Hope. The flowers are large, white, rose, purple, or yellow, with twelve to twenty stamens; leaves crowded, imbricated, sessile, ovate-triangular, terete or sub-globose, with stipules cut into five segments, often hair-like. Several species are cultivated in greenhouses.

Anacamptio (an-a-kam'tik), a. [Gr. ana, back, and kampō, to bend.] Reflecting or reflected; specifically, a term formerly applied to that part of optics which treats of reflection. Now called Catoptrics. See CATOPTRICS.—Anacamptic sounds, sounds produced by reflection, as echoes.

Anacamptically (an-a-kam'tik-al-ly), adv. By reflection; as, echoes are sounds anacamptically produced. [Rare.]

Anacamptics (an-a-kam'tiks), n. The doctrine of reflected light. See CATOPTRICS.

Anacanth (an'a-kanth), n. An osseous fish of the order Anacanthini.

Anacanthini (an'a-kan-thi'ni), n. pl. [Gr. neg. prefix an-, and akantha, a spine.] An order of osseous fishes, including the cod, plaice, &c., with spinelless fins, cycloid or stenoid scales, the ventral fins either absent or below the pectorals, and ductless swim-bladder. This order contains many existing edible fishes.

Anacanthous (an-a-kan'thus), a. Spineless; specifically, a term applied to fishes of the order Anacanthini.

Anacardiaceae (an-a-kar'di-'sē-sē), n. pl. A nat. order of polypteleous plants, with small flowers and compound dotless leaves, chiefly natives of tropical America, Africa, and India. They consist of woody plants, abounding in an acrid resin, their juice being often used as a varnish. Its use, however, is dangerous, on account of the extreme acidity of the fumes. To the order belong the sumach, the pistacia, the mango (Mangifera indica), the cashew (Anacardium occidentale), the marking-nut (Semecarpus Anacardium), the varnish-tree of Martaban (Melanorrhapha unitissima), and the Japan-lacquer (Rhus vernix). Mastic is the produce of Pistacia Lentiscus, a bush 10 or 12 feet high, growing on the coasts and islands of the Mediterranean.

Anacardio (an-a-kar'dik), a. Pertaining to the shell of the cashew-nut.—Anacardic acid (C₁₄H₁₆O₇), an acid of an aromatic and burning flavour found in the pericarp of the cashew-nut. It is white and crystalline.

Anacardium (an-a-kar'di-um), n. [Gr. anakardion—ana, according to, resembling, and kardia, the heart, the fruit being thought to resemble the heart of a bird.] A genus of woody plants, nat. order Anacardiaceae, natives of tropical America. They have a kidney-shaped fruit, borne on a fleshy pear-shaped receptacle. The receptacle is edible, and has an agreeable acid and somewhat astringent flavour. The fruits of A. occidentale are roasted, and the kernels having their acidity thus destroyed are the pleasant and wholesome cashew-nuts. (See CASHEW-NUT.) This tree yields a gum having qualities like those of gum-arabic, imported from South America under the name of Cadji Gum.

Anacatharsis (an'a-ka-thar'sis), n. [Gr. ana, upward, and kathairō, to cleanse.] In med. purgation upward; also cough, attended by expectoration.

Anacathartic (an'a-ka-thar'tik), a. In med. throwing upward; cleansing by exciting discharges from the mouth or nose, as vomiting, expectoration, &c.

Anacathartic (an'a-ka-thar'tik), n. A medicine which excites discharges by the mouth or nose, as expectorants, emetics, sternutories, and masticatories.

Anacephalosis (an-a-se-fal'ō-sis), n. [Gr. anakephalōsis, from anakephalōis, to sum up—ana, up, and kephalē, a head.] In rhet. a summing up; recapitulation of the principal heads of a discourse.

Anacharis (an-ak'ar-is), n. [From ana, for Gr. neg. prefix an-, and charis, favour, from being often a nuisance.] A genus of plants, nat. order Hydrocharidaceae, the species of which grow in ponds and streams of fresh water; water-thyme or water-weed. A. Alismastrum has been introduced from North America into British rivers, canals, and ponds, and by its rapid growth in dense tangled masses tends to choke them so as materially to impede navigation. It is a favourite food of swans and some other water-birds. From its weight it does not, like other plants, float when cut, but sinks to the bottom. It was first observed in Britain in 1842.

Anachoret (an-ak'ō-ret), n. An anchorite. 'An anachoret, the worst of all prisoners.' By. Hall.

Anachoretical (an-ak'ō-ret'ik-al), a. Relating to or resembling an anchorite or anchorite.

Anachorite (an-ak'ō-rit), n. Same as Anachoret. 'Monks, hermits, anachorites, that condemn the world.' Burton.

Anachronic, Anachronical (an-a-kron'ik, an-a-kron'ik-al), a. Same as Anachronous.

Anachronism (an-ak'ron-izm), n. [Gr. ana, implying inversion, error, and chronos, time.] An error in computing time; any error which implies the misplacing of persons or events in time, as where Shakespeare makes Hector quote Aristotle, who lived several hundred years after the assumed date of Hector, or where an artist introduces cannon into an historical picture belonging to a date previous to the invention of gunpowder; anything foreign to or out of keeping with a specified time. Anachronisms may be made in regard to mode of thought, style of writing, and the like, as well as in regard to events. 'The famous anachronism (of Virgil) in making Æneas and Dido contemporaries.' Dryden.

Anachronistic, Anachronistical (an-ak'ron-ist'ik, an-ak'ron-ist'ik-al), a. Same as Anachronous.

Anachronous (an-ak'ron-us), a. Erroneous in date; containing an anachronism.

Anaclasis (an-ak'la-sis), n. [Gr., a bending back or recurvature.] In surg. a recurvature of any part, as of a joint or fractured limb.

Anaclastic (an-a-klas'tik), a. [From Gr. anaklasis, a bending back, reflection of light or sound—Gr. ana, back, and klasis, a breaking, from klao, to break.] 1. Pertaining to or produced by the refraction of light: a orifice between the mouth and gullet) much enlarged and modified into a series of labyrinthine cells and duplications, so that they can retain sufficient water to keep the gills moist and enable the fish to live out of water as long as six days. The Anabas scandens, or climbing perch of India, a fish about 6 inches long, proceeds long distances over ch, chain; ch, Sc. look; g, go; j, job;

n, Fr. ton; ng, sing; Th, then; th, thin;

w, wig; wh, whig; zh, azure.—See KY term denominative of the apparent curves at the bottom of a vessel of water, caused by the refraction of light; also sometimes applied to that section of optics in which the refraction of light is considered, commonly called Dioptrics.—2. Bending back; flexible.—Anaclastic glass or phial, a glass with narrow mouth and wide convex bottom of such thinness that, when a little air is sucked from it, the bottom springs into a concave form with a smart crack; and when air is blown in, the bottom, with a like noise, springs into its former convex form.

Anaclastics (an-a-klast'iks), n. A term sometimes formerly used as equivalent to Dioptrics (which see).

Anaclisis (an-ak'li-sis), n. (Gr., from ana-khōō, to recline—ana, up, and khōō, to bend.) In med. the attitude of a sick person in bed, which affords important indications in several cases; decubitus.

Anacoenosis (an-a-kōē-nō'sis), n. (Gr. ana-kōōnōō—ana, and kōōnōō, common.) In rhet. a figure by which a speaker applies to his opponents for their opinion on the point in debate.

Anacoluthic, Anakolouthic (an'a-kol-ou'thik), Same as Anacoluthic.

Anacolouthon, Anakolouthon (an'a-kol-ou'thon), Same as Anacolouthon.

Anacoluthic, Anakoluthic (an'a-kol-ou'thik), n. In gram. and rhet. wanting sequence; containing an anacoluthon; as, an anacoluthic clause or sentence.

Anacoluthon, Anakoluthon (an'a-kol-ou'thon), n. (Gr. neg. prefix an, and akolouthōō, to follow.) In gram. and rhet. a want of coherency; want of sequence in a sentence, owing to the latter member of a sentence belonging to a different grammatical construction from the preceding. It prevails especially in Greek literature. The following are examples in English.

He that curseth father or mother, let him die the death. Mat. xv. 4.

His young and open soul—dissimulation
Is foreign to his habits. Coleridge.

Anaconda (an-a-kon'da), n. The popular name of two of the largest species of the serpent tribe, viz.: (a) A Ceylonese species of the genus Python (P. tigris), brilliantly coloured, its body being covered with gold and black scales finely intermixed. It is said to have been met with 33 feet long. (b) Eunectes murinus, a native of tropical America, allied to the boa-constrictor, and the largest of the serpent tribe, attaining, it is said, the length of 40 feet. It is of a warm brown colour, with black and yellow spots along the back and sides. Both are destitute of poison fangs, and kill their victims by constriction, twisting the tail round a tree, and crushing them in the folds of the body. It is said they can distend the throat so as to admit of the passage of a buffalo. One meal lasts them for weeks. They live near water, and prey on fish, and animals that come to drink.

Anacosta (an-a-kō'sta), n. [Sp.] A woollen fabric made in Holland and exported to Spain.

Anacreontic (a-nak'rō-on'tik), a. 1. Pertaining to or after the manner of Anacreon, a Greek poet whose odes and epigrams were celebrated for their delicate, easy, and graceful air, and for their truth to nature. They were devoted to the praise of love and wine. Hence, relating to the praise of love and wine; convivial; amatory.

Anacreontic, Anacreontique (a-nak'rō-on'tik, a-nak'rō-on'ték), n. A poem by Anacreon, or composed in the manner of Anacreon; a little poem in praise of love and wine.

To the miscellanies (of Cowley) succeed the anacreontiques. Johnson.

Anacrisis (a-nak'ri-sis), n. (Gr.—ana, denoting distinction, and krisis, inquiry, judgment.) In former times, an investigation of truth, interrogation of witnesses, and inquiry made into any fact, especially by torture.

Anadem (an'a-dem), n. (Gr. anadēma, a head-band or fillet—ana, up, and dēō, to bind.) A band, fillet, garland, or wreath worn on the head by women and young men. 'Wreaths and anadēma.' Tennyson.

Anademe (an'a-dē-mē), n. Same as Anadem. 'Garlands, anademes, and wreaths.' Dryden.

Anadiplosis (an-a-dip-lō'sis), n. (Gr.—ana, again, and diploōō, double.) A figure in rhetoric and poetry, consisting in the repetition of the last word or words in a line or clause of a sentence in the beginning of the next; as, 'He retained his virtues amidst all his misfortunes misfortunes which no prudence could foresee or prevent.' Johnson.

Anadrom (an'a-drom), n. [See ANADROMOUS.] A fish that leaves the sea and ascends rivers. [Rare.]

Anadromous (a-nad'rom-us), a. (Gr. ana, up, and dromōō, course.) Ascending; a word applied to such fish as pass from the sea into fresh waters at stated seasons, as the salmon.

Anæmia (a-nē-mi-a), n. (Gr.—an, priv., and haima, blood.) In med. a deficiency of blood. Except as the result of a wound or the direct loss of blood, anæmia is strictly only deficiency in the fibrin, and especially in the proportion of the red corpuscles of the blood.

Anæmic (a-nēm'ik), a. Pertaining to or affected with anæmia; deficient in blood; bloodless; as, anæmic symptoms, an anæmic patient.

Anæmied (a-nēm'id), a. Deprived of blood. 'The structure itself is anæmied.' Copland.

Anæmotrophy (an-a-mot'ro-fī), n. (Gr. an, priv., haima, blood, and trophē, nourishment.) In med. a deficiency of sanguineous nourishment.

Anæsthesia, Anæsthesia (an-es-thē'si-a, an-es-thē'sis), n. (Gr. anæsthesia, anæsthesiōō—an, priv., and æsthesiōō, to feel.) Loss of the sense of touch; diminished or lost sense of feeling; specifically, a state of insensibility, especially to the sense of pain, produced by inhaling chloroform, or by the application of other anæsthetic agents.

Anæsthetic (an-es-thē'tik), a. 1. Having the power of depriving of feeling or sensation; as, anæsthetic agents.—2. Of belonging to anæsthesia; characterized by anæsthesia, or insensibility to sensation; as, anæsthetic effects.

Anæsthetic (an-es-thē'tik), n. A substance which has the power of depriving of feeling or sensation, as chloroform, when its vapour is inhaled. Various agents have been used to produce anæsthesia by inhalation, the principal being sulphuric, chloric, and compound ethers, amylene, kerosene, but especially chloroform. Anæsthetics are administered during parturition and in painful diseases; but their chief use is in serious surgical operations. Congelation of the part by the application of freezing-mixtures and of the spray of ether, which freezes it by its instantaneous evaporation, and pressure on the nerve trunk are also frequently employed as anæsthetic agents in minor operations. Laughing-gas is commonly administered as anæsthetic by dentists.

Anæsthetize (an-es-thē'tiz), v. t. To bring under the influence of an anæsthetic agent, as chloroform, freezing-mixture, &c.; to render insensible to the feeling of pain.

Anagallis (an-a-gal'is), n. (Gr. ana, again, and gallōō, to adorn.) A genus of plants, nat. order Primulaceæ, the pimpernel genus. Two of the species are natives of Britain, and several others are grown in our gardens as ornamental plants. The fruit is a dry many-seeded capsule, which opens when ripe by a transverse fissure, the top falling off like a lid. See PIMPERNEL.

Anaglyph (an'a-glif), n. [Gr. anaglyphōō, embossed work—ana, up, and glyphōō, to engrave.] An ornament in relief chased or embossed in precious metal or stone, as a cameo.

Anaglyphic, Anaglyphical (an-a-glif'ik, an-a-glif'ik-al), a. Pertaining to anaglyphs or to the art of chasing and embossing in relief; opposed to diaglyphic.

Anaglyphic (an-a-glif'ik), n. In sculp. work chased or embossed in relief.

Anaglyphy (an-ag'li-fī), n. 1. The art of sculpturing in relief, or of chasing or embossing ornaments in relief, in the precious stones or metals.—2. The work thus executed.

Anaglyptic, Anaglyptical (an-a-glif'tik, an-a-glif'tik-al), a. [L. anaglypticus. See ANAGLYPH.] Relating to the art of carving, engraving, chasing, or embossing.

Anaglyptograph (an-a-glif-to-graf), n. (Gr. ana, up, glyphōō, fit for engraving, from glyphōō, to engrave, and graphōō, to write.) An instrument for making a medallion engraving of an object in relief, such as a medal or cameo.

Anaglyptographic (an-a-glif-to-graf'ik), a. Of or pertaining to anaglyptography.—

Anaglyptographic engraving, that process of engraving on an etching ground which gives to a subject the appearance of being raised from the surface of the paper, as if it were embossed, frequently employed in the representation of coins, medals, bas-reliefs, &c.

Anaglyptography (an'a-glif-to-graf'ik), n. [See ANAGLYPTOGRAPH.] The art of copying works in relief; anaglyptographic engraving.

Anagnorisis (a-nag-nō'ri-sis), n. (Gr., recognition—ana, again, gnōōō, to recognize.) In rhet. recognition; the unravelling of a plot in dramatic action.

Anagnostian (an-ag-nō'sti-an), n. (Gr. anagnotēs, a reader.) An ancient name for a curate who read only, or for a secretary that read to his master.

Anagoge (an'a-gō-jē), n. (Gr. anagōgē—ana, upward, and agōgē, a leading, from agōō, to lead.) 1. In med. an upward rejection, as the rejection of blood from the lungs by the mouth.—2. An elevation of mind to things celestial. Bailey.—3. The spiritual meaning or application of words; especially, the application of the types and allegories of the Old Testament to subjects of the New.

Anagogical (an'a-gō-jet'ik-al), a. Pertaining to anagoge or spiritual elevation; mysterious; anagogical.

Anagogic, Anagogical (an-a-gōj'ik, an-a-gōj'ik-al), a. Of or pertaining to anagoge; mysterious; elevated; spiritual; as, the rest of the Sabbath, in an anagogical sense, signifies the repose of the saints in heaven.

We cannot apply them (prophecies) to him, but by a mystical, anagogical explication. South.

Anagogic (an-a-gōj'ik), n. A mysterious or allegorical interpretation, especially of Scripture.

The notes upon that constitution say, that the Mosaic Torah was composed out of the cabalistic and anagogic of the Jews, or some allegorical interpretations pretended to be derived from Moses. L. Addison.

Anagogically (an-a-gōj'ik-al-ly), adv. In an anagogic or mysterious sense; with religious elevation.

Anagogy (an'a-gō-jē), n. Same as Anagoge.

Anagram (an'a-gram), n. (Gr.—ana, up, again, and gramma, a letter.) In its proper sense, the letters of one or several words read backwards, and then forming a new word; thus, evil is an anagram of live. In a wider and more usual sense, a transposition of the letters of a word or sentence, to form a new word or sentence; thus, Galeasus is an anagram of angelus. Dr. Burney's anagram of Horatio Nelson is one of the happiest, Honor est a Nilo (Honour is from Nile).

Anagram (an'a-gram), v. t. To form into an anagram.

Anagrammatic, Anagrammatical (an'a-gram-mat'ik, an'a-gram-mat'ik-al), a. Pertaining to or forming an anagram.

Anagrammatically (an'a-gram-mat'ik-al-ly), adv. In the manner of an anagram.

Anagrammatism (an-a-gram-mat-izm), n. The act or practice of making anagrams.

Anagrammatist (an-a-gram-mat-ist), n. A maker of anagrams.

Anagrammatize (an-a-gram-mat-iz), v. t. To transpose, as the letters of a word, so as to form an anagram.

Others anagrammatize it from Eve (Eve) into Ve, because they say she was the cause of our woe. Auct.

Anagrammatize (an-a-gram-mat-iz), v. t. To make anagrams.

Anagraph (an'a-graf), n. (Gr. anagrapheōō, a writing out—ana, up, and graphōō, to write.) An inventory; a commentary.

Anagros (an'a-gros), n. A measure of grain in Spain, containing something less than two bushels.

Anakoluthic. See ANACOLUTHIC.

Anakoluthon. See ANACOLUTHON.

Anal (ā'nal), a. [L. anus, the fundament.] Pertaining to or situated near the anus; as, the anal fin in fishes, the fin placed between the vent and tail, which expands perpendicularly.

Analcim, Analcime (a-nal'sim), n. (Gr. an, priv., and alimos, strong, from alōō, strength.) A zeolitic mineral found generally crystallized in cubic crystals, but also amorphous, and in reniform, mammillary, laminated, or radiated masses. It is of frequent occurrence in trap-rocks, especially in the cavities of amygdaloids. It melts under the blowpipe into a semi-transparent glass. By friction it acquires a weak electricity; hence its name.

Analect (an'-lekt), n. [See ANALOTA.] A small piece selected from an author; an extract.

Analepta (an-a-lek'ta), n. pl. [Gr. neut. pl. of analekto, select—ana, up, and lekto, to gather.] Collections of extracts or small pieces from different authors.

Analeptic (an-a-lek'tik), a. Relating to analepta, collections, or selections; made up of selections; as, an analeptic magazine.

Analemma (an-a-lem'ma), n. [L., a sun-dial; Gr., a pedestal—ana, and lambano, to take, hold.] 1. A form of sun-dial, now disused. 2. In geom. a projection of the sphere on the plane of the meridian, orthographically made by straight lines, circles, and ellipses, the eye being supposed at an infinite distance, and in the east or west points of the horizon. — 3. An instrument of wood or brass on which this kind of projection is drawn: formerly used in solving astronomical problems. — 4. A tabular mark, usually in the form of the figure 8, depicted across the terraced zone on an artificial terrestrial globe, to notify the sun's declination on any day of the year.

Analepsis (an-a-lep'sis), n. [Gr., from ana, up or again, and lepsis, a taking, from lambano, to take.] In med. recovery of strength after disease.

Analepsy (an-a-lep-si), n. In med. a species of epileptic attack of sudden and frequent occurrence, but not regarded as dangerous.

Analeptics (an-a-lep'tiks), a. [Gr. analeptikos, restorative. See ANALEPSIS.] Corroborating; invigorating; giving strength after disease; as, an analeptic medicine.

Analog (an-a-log), a. Analogous. Sir M. Hale.

Analogical (an-a-loj'ik-al), a. 1. Having analogy, resemblance, or relation; analogous. — 2. Used by way of analogy; founded on or directed by analogy; expressing or implying analogy. 'Analogical representation.' Stillingfleet.

There is placed the minerals between the inanimate and vegetable province, participating something analogical to either. Sir M. Hale.

2. Used by way of analogy; founded on or directed by analogy; expressing or implying analogy. 'Analogical representation.' Stillingfleet.

We have words which are proper and not analogical. Rid.

Analogically (an-a-loj'ik-al-ly), adv. In an analogical manner; by way of similitude, relation, or agreement.

A prince is analogically styled a pilot, being to the state as a pilot is to the vessel. Burke.

Analogicalness (an-a-loj'ik-al-ness), n. The quality of being analogical; fitness to be applied for the illustration of some analogy.

Analogue (an-a-loj'ion), n. [Gr.] Ecceles. a term for a reading-desk or lectern; also for a movable pulpit.

Analogism (an-a-loj'izm), n. [Gr. analogismos.] 1. In logic, an argument from the cause to the effect; an a priori argument. — 2. Investigation of things by the analogy they bear to each other.

Analogue (an-a-loj'ism), n. One who adheres to analogy.

Analogize (an-a-loj'iz), v. t. pret. & pp. analogized; ppr. analogizing. To explain by analogy; to form some resemblance between; to consider with regard to its analogy to something else.

Analogous (an-a-log-on), a. Something analogous; an analogue. Coleridge. [Rare.]

Analogous (an-a-log-us), a. 1. Having analogy; corresponding to something else; bearing some resemblance or proportion; as, there is something in the exercise of the mind analogous to that of the body; animal organs, as the wing of a bird and that of a bat, which perform the same function, though different in structure, are analogous. — 2. In chem. closely similar, but differing in some approximate degree as to each of the more prominent characters. Dana. — SYN. Correspondent, similar, like.

Analogously (an-a-log-us-ly), adv. In an analogous manner.

Analogous (an'-a-log), a. [Gr. analogos.] Something having analogy with something else; an object having some agreement or correspondence in relations or functions with another object.

An ex-trumpet is a true analogue of the telescope. R. A. Proctor.

Specifically, in philol. (a) a word corresponding with another; an analogous term. (b) In zool. and bot. an animal or plant belonging to one group or region corresponding in some special and essential attributes or relations to another member of another group or region, so that it is its representative or counterpart. (c) In compar. anat. an organ in one species or group having the same function as an organ of different structure in another species or group. The difference between homologous and analogous may be illustrated by the wing of a bird and that of a butterfly; as the two totally differ in anatomical structure, they cannot be said to be homologous, but they are analogous in function, since they both serve for flight.

Analogy (an-a-loj'i), n. [Gr. analogia—ana, according to, and logos, ratio, proportion.] 1. An agreement or likeness between things in some circumstances or effects, when the things are otherwise entirely different; thus, when we say that learning enlightens the mind, we recognise an analogy between learning and light, the former being to the mind what light is to the eye, enabling it to discover things before hidden. Analogy is sometimes confounded with similarity, but improperly. The latter denotes general likeness or resemblance; the former implies general difference, with identity or sameness in one or more relations or functions. Thus there is analogy, but no similarity between the lungs of animals and the gills of fishes. [We say that there is an analogy between things and that one thing has an analogy to or with another.] — 2. In geom. equality, proportion, or similarity of ratios; thus, 2 is to 6 as 3 is to 9, is an analogy. — 3. In gram. conformity to the spirit, structure, or general rules of a language; similarity as respects any of the characteristics of a language, as derivation, inflection, pronunciation, &c.

Analysable (an-a-liz'-a-bl), a. Capable of being analysed.

Analysableness (an-a-liz'-a-bl-ness), n. The state or quality of being analysable.

Analysation (an-a-liz'-a-shon), n. The act of analysing.

Analyse (an'-a-liz), v. t. pret. & pp. analysed; ppr. analysing. [Fr. analyser. See ANALYSIS.] To resolve into its elements; to separate, as a compound subject, into its parts or propositions, for the purpose of an examination of each separately; as, to analyse a mineral; to analyse an action to ascertain its morality.

When sympathy is in action we may, by analysing our idea of it, reduce it to five different heads, and may classify it as continued, or contiguous, or remote, or similar, or dissimilar. Buckle.

[Analyse and its derivatives are sometimes incorrectly written with s instead of z.]

Analysed (an'-a-liz), n. Analysis.

The analysis of it (a tractate) may be spared, since it is in many hands. Bp. Hackett.

Analysier (an-a-liz-er), n. One who or that which analyses or has the power to analyse; as, in optics, the part of a polariscope which receives the light after polarization and exhibits its properties, as a movable reflecting plate, a tourmaline, or a doubly refracting crystal.

Analysis (an-a-liz'-is), *n. pl. Analyses (an-a-liz'-is). [Gr. prefix ana, implying distribution (see ANA), and lysis, a loosening, resolving, from lyo, to loosen.] 1. The resolution of a compound object whether of the senses or the intellect into its constituent elements or component parts; a consideration of anything in its separate parts and their relation to each other; an examination of the different parts of a subject, each separately, as the words which compose a sentence, the tones of a tune, or the simple propositions which enter into an argument: opposed to synthesis. — 2. In math. the resolving of problems by algebraic equations. The analysis of finite quantities is otherwise called algebra. The analysis of infinities is the method of fluxions, or the differential calculus. See Analytical Geometry under ANALYTIC. — 3. In chem. the process of decomposing a compound substance with a view to determine either (a) what elements it contains (qualitative analysis), or (b) how much of each element is present (quantitative analysis). — 4. In logic, the tracing of things to their source, and the resolving of knowledge into its original principles. — 5. A syllabus or table of the principal heads of a continued discourse, disposed in their natural order. — 6. A brief, methodical illustration of the principles of a science. In this sense it is nearly synonymous with synopsis. — Spectrum analysis. See SPECTRUM, SPECTROSCOPY. — Assay, Analysis. See ASSAY.*

Descartes . . . was chiefly pre-eminent for his power of intense reflection—for his acute analysis of mind and its operations. J. D. Morrell.

Analyst (an'-a-list), n. One who analyses or is versed in analysis.

Analytic, Analytical (an-a-lit'ik, an-a-lit'ik-al), n. 1. Pertaining to analysis; that resolves into first principles or elements; that separates into parts or original principles; that resolves a compound body or subject; as, an analytical experiment in chemistry, or an analytical investigation of facts to determine principles: opposed to synthetic. Specifically. — 2. In philol. free from inflections, and employing instead prepositions and auxiliary verbs to express modifications of meaning, and show the relations of words in a sentence; as, an analytic language. — Analytical or co-ordinate geometry, is the method invented by Descartes of applying algebra to the investigation of the properties of lines, figures, and bodies of three dimensions, certain properties of these geometrical magnitudes being expressed by means of equations, which show the relations subsisting between them and two given straight lines or three given planes intersecting one another, and from which other properties may be deduced. Plane analytical geometry is based on the fact that every point in the same plane can have its position determined by referring it to two lines that intersect one another, just as any spot on the earth is determined when its latitude, or angular distance from the equator, and longitude, or angular distance from the first meridian, are given; and the analytical geometry of solid bodies is based on the fact that the position of any point in space can be determined by reference to three intersecting planes. In plane analytical geometry the intersecting lines are called the co-ordinate axes, their point of intersection the origin, and the distances of any point from the two lines are called the co-ordinates of that point, the one being called the ordinate, and the other (usually the horizontal distance) the abscissa. The distance of the point from either of the lines is always measured by the length of a line parallel to the other. The equation or equations of any line or figure state some relation between the co-ordinates of any point in that line, or in the circumference of the figure, and some other line or lines derived from these magnitudes. Thus the equation of a circle shows the relation between the radius and the co-ordinates of any point in the circumference. In the analytical geometry of solid bodies the intersecting planes are called the co-ordinate planes, and they are always given with their lines of intersection, which are called the co-ordinate axes, passing through the same point, called the origin. Another method of determining the position of points in space for the purposes of analytical geometry is to give the distance of the point from a given point, with the direction in which that distance must be measured with reference to a given line. This is called the system of polar co-ordinates, and is of great importance in mechanics and astronomy. The point to which all others are referred is called the pole, and the distance of any point the radius vector of that point. Most of the problems of analytical geometry are facilitated by the differential and integral calculus.

Analytically (an-a-lit'ik-al-ly), adv. In an analytical manner; in the manner of analysis.

Analytios (an-a-lit'iks), n. The science of analysis.

Anamense (an'-a-méz), a. Of or pertaining to Anam, a feudatory dependency of China, comprising a large part of the south-eastern peninsula of Asia from the Chinese Empire southward.

Anamese (an'-a-méz), n. 1. A native or inhabitant, or the natives or inhabitants of Anam. — 2. The language spoken in Anam.

Anamense (a-nam'-e-sis), n. [Gr. anamesos, intermediate.] A variety of basalt intermediate between the very fine-grained compact form (basalt), and the coarse-grained conspicuously crystalline form (dolerite).

Anamirta (a-na-mér'ta), n. A genus of plants, nat. order Menispermaceae, constituted by some botanists for the reception of Cocculus indicus.

Anamnesis (an-am-né'sis), n. [Gr.—ana, again, and mnēsis, remembrance.] In rhet. a figure which calls to remembrance something omitted.

Anamnestic (an-am-nés'tik), a. Aiding the memory.

Anamniotic (an-am'ni-ot'ik), a. [Gr an, priv., and amniot.] Having no amnion; as, fishes and amphibians are anamniotic vertebrates.

Anamorphism (an-a-mor'fizm), n. Same as Anamorphosis.

Anamorphosis (an-a-mor'fō-sis or an-a-mor'fō'sis), n. [Gr ana, again, and morphōsis, formation, from morphe, a form.] 1 In perry a term denoting a drawing executed in such a manner as to present a distorted image of the object represented, but which, when viewed from a certain point, or reflected by a curved mirror or through a polyhedron shows the object in its true proportions. — 2 In bot an anomalous or monstrous development of any part of a plant owing to a change in the conditions accompanying growth, but which presents an appearance altogether unlike the typical form, as when the calyx of a rose assumes the form of a leaf. Lichens are so liable to this change of form from modifications of climate, soil, &c., that some varieties have been placed in three or four genera. — 3 In zool and bot the gradual change of form, generally ascending, traced in a group of animals or plants, the members of which succeed each other in point of time. Thus the earlier members of any group observed in the lower geologic formations are by some assumed to be of a lower type and in point of development inferior to their analogues in the more recent strata, or now living, but this has been controverted, especially by the opponents of Darwinism.

Anamorphosis (an-a-mor'fō-sis), n. Same as Anamorphosis.

Anan' (a-nan'), adv. Now; immediately.

Go no, little blunder, for this, anon
You'll steal forth a laugh in the shade of your fun.
— B. T. Mason

Anan' (a-nan'), interj. An interrogative particle employed by uneducated persons when they do not understand or have not heard properly what has been said.

Well, what say you to a friend who would take the bitter bargain of your hand? Anan! Goldsmith

Anana (an-a'na), n. [See ANANAS.] A pineapple. [Rare.]

Witness thou how anana, thou the pride
Of vegetable life. Thomson

Ananas (an-a'nas), n. [See ANANAS.] A name of the pine-apple.

Ananassa (an-a'na-sa), n. [Anassa, anassa, or anassa, native name among the Tupis of Brazil.] A genus of plants, nat. order Bromeliaceae. — active produces the pine-apple (which see).

Ananachytes (an-a-nach'ites), n. A genus or subdivision of fossil sea-urchins belonging to the tribe Spatangidae, called in the south of England 'shepherds' crowns' and 'fairy leaves', and especially characteristic of the upper chalk. They have a raised helmet-like form, simple ambulacra, transverse mouth, and oblong outlet.

1. Ananachytes.
2. A. ovata. 3. A. tuberculata.

Anandrous (an-an'drus), a. [Gr an, priv., and andros, a male or stamen.] In bot a term applied to flowers that are destitute of a stamen (female flowers) formerly applied to cryptogamic plants, because they were supposed to have no male organs.

Anangular (an-an'gū-lar), a. [Gr prefix an for a, priv., and angular.] Having no angle or angles.

Anantherous (an-an'ther-us), a. [Gr an, priv., and K. anther.] In bot destitute of anther.

Ananthesis (an-an'this), a. [Gr an, priv., and anthesis.] Destitute of flowers.

Anapest (an-a'pest), n. Same as Anapaest.

Anapaestic (an-a'pestik), a. Same as Anapaest.

Anapaest (an-a'pest), n. [L. anapaestus, from Gr anapaestus, struck back, reversed — ana, back, and paest, to strike.] A poetical foot consisting of three syllables, the first two short or unaccented, the last long or accented the reverse of the dactyl.

Anapaestic (an-a'pestik), a. The anapaestic measure, an anapaestic verse. The following is an example of anapaestic.

Can a blossom so gently remain
Unmoved when her Cupid's signal? Shakespeare

Anapaestic (an-a'pestik), a. Pertaining to an anapaest; consisting of anapaestic foot.

Anapaestically (an-a'pestik-al-i), adv. In an anapaestic manner.

Anaphora (an-a'fō-ra), n. [Gr, a bringing again, a recurrence — ana, back, again, and phero, to bring.] 1 In ret a figure in which the same word or words are repeated at the beginning of two or more succeeding verses or clauses of a sentence; as, 'Where is the wise? Where is the scribe? Where is the disputer of this world?' 1 Cor. I. 20. — 2 In astron a term applied to the oblique ascensions of the stars.

Anaphrodisiac (an-a'fō-dir'ik), n. [Gr neg prefix an, and aphrodisiakos, venereal, from aphrodisia, sexual pleasure. See APHRODISIA.] A substance capable of dulling sexual appetite, an anaphrodisiac.

Anaplastia (an-a'plast'ik), a. Of or pertaining to, performed by, or used in, the operation of anaplasty, as, an anaplastic instrument.

Anaplasty (an-a'plast'ik), a. [Gr ana, again, and plasse, to fashion.] In surg an operation to repair superficial lesions, or solutions of continuity, by the employment of adjacent healthy structure. Artificial noses, &c., are thus made.

Anaplerotic (an-a'ple-rot'ik), a. [L. anapleroticus, from Gr anaplerō, to fill up or full — ana, up, and plero, to fill.] In med, filling up, promoting granulation of wounds or ulcers.

Anaplerotic (an-a'ple-rot'ik), n. A remedy which promotes the granulation of wounds and ulcers.

Anapophysis (an-a'pōf'is), n. [Gr ana, back, and apophysis, an offshoot.] In anat, the process of a vertebra which, arising in the dorsal region, recedes to the side and projects more or less backward. It is well developed in the hare and most rodents.

Anarch (an'ark), n. [See ANARCHY.] The author of anarchy; one who excites revolt.

Him thus the anarch old
With faltering speech, and vague incomprehend, Answer'd. Milton

Anarchal, Anarchical (an-ark'al, an-ark'al), a. Ungoverned, lawless, anarchical. [Rare.]

We are in the habit of calling those bodies of men anarchal which are in a state of efferecence. London

Anarchia, Anarchical (an-ark'ik, an-ark'ik-al), a. Of or pertaining to, proceeding from, or dictated by a state of anarchy; without rule or government; in a state of confusion.

They expect that they shall hold in obedience an anarchic people by an anarchic law. Burke

Anarchism (an-ark'izm), n. Confusion, anarchy. 'Absolute anarchy.' Sir E. Dering

Anarchist (an-ark'ist), n. One who excites revolt or promotes disorder in a state, an anarch.

Anarchy (an'ark-i), n. [Gr anarchia, lawlessness — an, priv., and arche, rule.] 1 Want of government, a state of society when there is no law or supreme power, or when the laws are not efficient, and individuals do what they please with impunity; political confusion.

It seemed but too likely that England would fall under the most odious and degrading of all kinds of government, — writing all the evils of despotism to all the evils of anarchy. Mackay

2 Confusion in general. 'There being then an anarchy, as I may term it, in authors and their reckoning of years.' Fuller

Anarthaxis (an-ark'aks-is), n. [Gr, from anarthaxis — ana, up, and arthaxis, to break.] In surg the breaking of a united fracture.

Anarthichas (a-nar'ti-kas), n. [Gr anarthichas, to clamber or scramble up, some of the species being said to be able to clamber up rocks.] A genus of ascanthopod terygian fishes, family Blennioidae. The species are ravenous and found in the north seas. A. lupus is the sea-wolf, wolf-fish, or cat-fish. See WOLF FISH.

Anarthropoda (an-ar'throp'o-da), n. pl. [Gr an, priv., arthros, joint, and poda, paws, foot.] One of the two great divisions (the Arthropoda being the other) of the Animalia, or ringed animals, in which there are no articulated appendages. It includes the spoon-worms, leeches, earthworms, tube-worms, and sand-worms.

Anarthropodous (an-ar'throp'o-dus), a. Of or pertaining to the Anarthropoda.

Anarthron (an-ar'thrōn), a. [Gr an, priv., and arthron, a joint or article.] 1 In gram, without the article. — 2 In med having neither wings nor legs, as worms, leeches, &c.

Anas (a'nas), n. [L.] A Linnaean genus of birds, included in the order Palimpedae (or web-footed birds) in the system of Cuvier, and divided by recent ornithologists into a number of genera, one of which, retaining the name Anas, contains the true ducks. See DUCK, 1.

Anasarra (an-a'sar'ra), n. [Gr ana, implying distribution, through, and asarra, each.] 1 In med dropsy of the cellular tissue, an effusion of serum into the cellular substance, occasioning a soft, pale, inelastic swelling of the skin, general dropsy. — 2 In bot the condition of plants when the tissues get gorged with fluid in very wet weather.

Anasarcous (an-a'sar'kus), a. Belonging to or affected by anasarca or dropsy; dropsical.

Anastaltic (an-a'stal'tik), a. [Gr anastaltikos, fitted for checking, from anastellein, to send up or back, to check — ana, up, back, and stello, to send.] In med, astringent; styptic.

Anastatic (an-a'stat'ik), a. [Gr anastaticus, a setting up — ana, up, again, and histano, to stand.] Raised, consisting of or furnished with raised characters, as, anastatic plates. — Anastatic printing or engraving, a mode of obtaining facsimile impressions of any printed page or engraving by transferring it to a plate of zinc, which, on being subjected to the action of an acid, is etched or eaten away with the exception of the parts covered with the ink, which parts being thus protected from the action of the acid, are left in relief so that they can readily be printed from.

Anastasis (an-a'stat'ik-a), n. [Gr ana, up, and histano, to stand.] A genus of plants, nat. order Cruciferae. A. asserchatica is the rose of Jericho or resurrection plant, found near the Dead Sea, and remarkable for the power the dried plant possesses of Rose of Jericho (Anastasis asserchatica).

1. The plant. 2. The root dried. 3. The root expanded after being put in water.

absorbing water when placed in it and appearing to live. It is said to have bloomed at Christmas to salute the birth of Christ, and to have remained expanded till Easter or the resurrection. The plant is gathered in great quantities and sent to Jerusalem, where it is sold to pilgrims.

Anastomosis (a-nas'tō-miz), v. i. Same as Anastomose. [Rare.]

Anastomose (a-nas'tō-mōz), v. t. pres. & pp. anastomosed, ppr anastomosing. [Gr anastomazein, Or anastomōs — ana, again, anew, and stoma, a mouth.] In anat and bot to inoculate or run into each other, to communicate with each other, as the arteries and veins. 'The ribbing of the leaf, and the anastomosing net-work of its vessels.

Is. Taylor.

Anastomosis (a-nas'tō-mō'sis), n. In anat. and bot. the inoculation of vessels, or the opening of one vessel into another, as an artery into another artery, or a vein into a vein. By means of anastomosis, if the course of a fluid is arrested in one vessel it can proceed along others. It is by anastomosis that circulation is re-established in amputated limbs, and in aneurism when the vessel is tied.

Anastomotic (a-nas'tō-mō'tik), a. 1. Pertaining to anastomosis. — 2. In med. having the quality of removing obstructions.

Anastomotic (a-nas'tō-mō'tik), n. A medicine supposed to have the power of opening the mouths of vessels, and promoting circulation, such as cathartics, deobstruents, and sudorifics.

Anastrophe, Anastrophy (a-nas'tro-fe), n. [Gr., a turning back—ana, back or again, and strophē, to turn.] In rhet. and gram. an inversion of the natural order of words; as, 'echoed the hills, for 'the hills echoed.'

Anatase (an-a-tās), n. [Gr. anatisis, extension, so named from the length of its crystals.] Octahedral oxide of titanium; a mineral that shows a variety of colours by reflected light, from indigo blue to reddish brown; octahedrite. It is usually crystallized in acute, elongated, pyramidal octahedrons.

Anathema (a-nath'-ē-ma), n. [Gr. anathema, in New Testament and ecclesiastical Greek, an accursed thing, a thing devoted to evil, from anathēmē, to set up as a votive offering, to dedicate—ana, up, and thēmē, to set or place.] 1. A curse or denunciation pronounced with religious solemnity by ecclesiastical authority, and accompanied by excommunication. This species of excommunication was practised in the ancient churches against notorious offenders. Churches were warned not to receive them, magistrates and private persons were admonished not to harbour or maintain them, and priests were enjoined not to converse with them or attend their funeral. Called also Judiciary Anathema. — 2. Excretion generally; denouncement of evil.

She fled to London, followed by the anathemas of both.
Thackeray.

3. The person or thing devoted to destruction.

The Jewish nation was an anathema destined to destruction. St. Paul . . . says he could wish to save them from it, and to become an anathema, and to be destroyed himself.
Luther.

—Abjunctory anathema, the act of a convert who anathematizes the heresy which he abjures.

Anathematical (a-nath'-ē-mat'-ik-al), a. Pertaining to or having the nature of an anathema.

Anathematically (a-nath'-ē-mat'-ik-al-ly), adv. In the manner of anathema.

Anathematism (a-nath'-ē-mat'-izm), n. Act of anathematizing; an excommunicatory curse.

We find a law of Justinian forbidding anathematism to be pronounced against the Jewish Hellenists.
Jer. Taylor.

Anathematization (a-nath'-ē-mat'-iz-ā'-shon), n. The act of anathematizing; an excommunicatory curse. 'Anathematizations of persons deceased in the peace of the church.'
Barron.

Anathematize (a-nath'-ē-mat'-iz), v.t. pret. & pp. anathematized; ppr. anathematizing. To pronounce an anathema against.

Anathematise (a-nath'-ē-mat'-iz), v.i. To pronounce anathemas; to denounce; to curse.

Well may mankind shriek, inarticulately anathematizing as they can.
Carlyle.

Anathematizer (a-nath'-ē-mat'-iz-er), n. One who anathematizes.

Anathema (an-a-thēm), n. An anathema. [Rare.]

Your holy father of Rome hath smitten with his thunderbolt of excommunications and anathemas . . . most of the orthodox churches of the world.
Sheldon.

Anatide (a-nat'-idē), n. pl. [L. anas, anatis, a duck, and Gr. eidōs, resemblance.] A family of web-footed anserine or anatoid birds, of which the genus Anas is the type.

Anatifa (a-nat'-fa), n. [Contr. for Anatiferus—L. anas, anatis, a duck, and fero, to bear.] A genus of cirripeds, now called Lepas. From a fancied resemblance of its shell to a bird, there arose an absurd fable that a species of goose, called the barnacle goose (Anas), came from this animal; hence the name Anatifa, as well as goose-mussel. See LEPAS, LEPADIDÆ.

Anatifer (a-nat'-fēr), n. A barnacle. See ANATIFA.

Anatiferous (an-a-tifēr-us), n. [L. anas, anatis, a duck, and fero, to produce.] Producing ducks.

If there be anatiferous trees, whose corruption breaks forth into barnacles; yet, if they corrupt, they degenerate into maggots, which produce not them again.
Sir T. Browne.

Anatines (an-a-tin'-ē), n. pl. [L. anas, anatis, a duck.] A sub-family of the Anatidæ, comprehending the true ducks, distinguished from swans and geese by having broader bills, a more waddling gait from their legs being placed farther behind, and the existence of a marked difference in the plumage of the sexes. The species are sometimes divided into the oceanic ducks, as the scoter, the parrot, the elder, the scaup, &c.; and the lake ducks, as the sheldrake, the teal, the widgeon, the mallard, and the common domestic duck.

Anatocism (a-nat'-o-sizm), n. [L. anatocismus, Gr. anatokimos, compound interest—ana, again, and tokizō, to lend on interest, tokos, produce, from tithō, to bring forth.] Interest upon interest; the taking of compound interest, or the contract by which such interest is secured. [Rare.]

Anatomic, Anatomical (an-a-tom'-ik, an-a-tom'-ik-al), a. Belonging to anatomy or dissection; produced by or according to the principles of anatomy or natural structure of the body; relating to the parts of the body when dissected or separated; as, anatomical observations.

Anatomically (an-a-tom'-ik-al-ly), adv. In an anatomical manner; by means of dissection; according to the doctrine of anatomy.

Anatomism (a-nat'-o-mizm), n. The doctrine of the examination of the parts of an organic body, to explain the phenomena of the organism.

Anatomist (a-nat'-o-mist), n. One who dissects bodies; more generally, one who is skilled in the art of dissection, or versed in the doctrine and principles of anatomy.

Anatomization (a-nat'-o-miz-ā'-shon), n. The act of anatomizing.

Anatomize (a-nat'-o-miz), v.t. pret. & pp. anatomized; ppr. anatomizing. 1. To dissect; to cut in pieces, as an animal or vegetable body, for the purpose of displaying or examining the structure and use of the several parts. — 2. Fig. to lay open or expose minutely; to analyse; as, to anatomize an argument.

In her the painter had anatomized time's ruin.
Shak.

Anatomy (a-nat'-o-mī), n. [Gr. anatōmē—ana, implying separation and distribution, and tomē, a cutting.] 1. The art of dissecting or artificially separating the different parts of an organized body, to discover their situation, structure, and economy; the science which treats of the internal structure of organized bodies; generally applied more specifically to the dissection of or to the knowledge of the structure of the human body; that branch which treats of the structure of plants being called vegetable anatomy, and that which treats of the structure of animals animal anatomy or zootomy. — Special or descriptive anatomy, that branch which treats of the organs of which the human body consists, with regard to their shape, position, and mutual relations. — General anatomy, that branch which treats of the structure and physical properties of the different tissues which are common to several organs, without reference to the form or situation of the organs themselves. — Pathological anatomy, that branch of anatomy which treats of the changes in structure of organs and tissues produced by disease, and of congenital malformations. — Comparative anatomy, the science which compares the anatomy of different classes or species of animals, as that of man with quadrupeds, or that of fishes with quadrupeds. — Transcendental anatomy, that branch which investigates the plan or model upon which the animal frame or organs are formed. — Surgical anatomy, that branch which demonstrates the relative position of organs or parts, with a view to those operations which it may be necessary to perform upon them. — Physiological anatomy, that branch which treats of the structure of organs, only in as far as it elucidates their functions. — Artificial anatomy, the art of making models in wax or other materials, to illustrate the healthy or diseased structure of parts. — 2. Fig. the act of dividing anything, material or intellectual, for the purpose of examining its parts; as, the anatomy of a discourse. — 3. The body stripped of its integuments and muscles; a skeleton, or the corporeal frame of bones entire, without the skin, flesh, and vessels; hence, a thin, meagre person.

The anatomy of a little child . . . is accounted a greater rarity than the skeleton of a man in full stature.
Fuller.

They brought one Pinch, a hungry, lean-faced villain,
A mere anatomy, a mountebank.
Shak.

Anatreptic (an-a-trep'tik), a. [Gr. anatreptikos, from anatrepo, to overturn—ana, up, and trepō, to turn.] Overthrowing; defeating; prostrating; a word applied to those dialogues of Plato which represent a defeat in the gymnastic exercises.

Anatripe (an-a-trip'sis), n. [Gr., from ana, denoting repetition, and tridō, tripeō, to rub.] In med. friction employed as a remedy.

Anatron (an'a-tron), n. [Fr. anatron; Ar. al-natron, al-nitrin, from Gr. nitron, a mineral alkali, either soda or potassa, or both.] 1. Spume or glass gall, a scum which rises upon melted glass in the furnace, and when taken off dissolves in the air, and coagulates into common salt. — 2. The salt which collects on the walls of vaults; salt-petre.

Anatropal, Anatropeus (a-nat'-rop-al, a-nat'-rop-us), a. [Gr. ana, noting inversion, and trepō, to turn.] In bot. having the ovule inverted at an early period in its development, so that the chalazas is at its apparent apex.

Anatropal Ovule

Anatto (a-nat'tō), n. Same as Arnatto.

Anbury (an'bu-ri), n. Same as Ambury (which see).

Ancestor (an'ses-tēr), n. [O.Fr. ancestre, ancestor, Fr. ancêtre, an ancestor, from L. ante, before, and cedo, cedum, to go. See CEDE.] 1. One from whom a person descends, either by the father or mother, at any distance of time; a progenitor; a forefather. — 2. In law, one who has preceded another in the possession of real estate; one from whom an inheritance is derived: the correlative of heir.

Ancestral (an'ses-tēr-i-al), a. Ancestral. Ancestral and national glories. Sir F. Palgrave.

Ancestrally (an'ses-tēr-i-al-ly), adv. In an ancestral manner; with regard to ancestors. Sidney Smith.

Ancestral (an'ses-tral), a. Pertaining to ancestors; claimed or descending from ancestors; as, an ancestral estate; ancestral trees. 'Seated on his ancestral throne.'
Macaulay.

Tenure by homage ancestral was merely tenancy-in-chief by immemorial prescription in the family.
C. J. Austin.

Ancestress (an'ses-tres), n. A female ancestor. [Rare.]

This ancestress is a lady, or rather the ghost of a lady.
Carlyle.

Ancestry (an'ses-tri), n. 1. A series of ancestors or progenitors; lineage, or those who compose the line of natural descent. 'Headless statues of his ancestry.' Macaulay. Hence—2. Honourable descent; high birth.

Title and ancestry render a good man more illustrious, but a bad one more conspicuous.
Addison.

Anchilops (ang'ki-lope), n. [Gr., corrupted from angilops—ankis, a goat, and ops, the eye.] In med. an abscess in the inner angle of the eye; an incipient fistula lachrymalis.

Anchithere (ang'ki-thēr), n. A member of the genus Anchitherium.

The horse can even boast a pedigree in this quarter of the world, in a right line, through a slender three-toed ancestry, as far back as the anchithere of the eocene period.
Edin. Review.

Anchitherium (ang-ki-thēr-i-um), n. [Gr. anchi, near, and thērion, a wild beast.] A fossil genus of pachydermatous mammals, from the upper eocene and lower miocene, belonging to the family Equidæ, in which each foot is furnished with a single functional hoofed toe, flanked by two small hoofed digits, which are sufficiently developed to touch the ground. The only recognized species was about the size of a sheep, and was closely allied to the Palmotherium.

Anchor (ang'kér), n. [A. Sax. anor, anor, G. D. and Dan. anker, Icel. akkri, probably all borrowed from L. ancora, Gr. angkyra, an anchor, whence Fr. ancre, Pr. Sp. Pg. It. ancora. From a root ang, crooked, bent, seen in L. angulus, a corner, and uncus, a hook, crooked; in Gr. angulos, a bend, angulos, angyle, the bend of the arm, E. ankle, A. Sax. ancleous, G. ankel, the ankle; Bav. anke, the bend of the neck; and probably in E. angle, a fish-hook, to fish with a hook; G. angel, a hook.] 1. An implement for holding a ship or other vessel at rest in the water. In former times anchors were merely large stones, baskets of stones, &c. The anchor now used is of iron, formed with a strong shank a, at one extremity of which is the crown c, from which branch out two arms bb, terminating in broad palms or flukes dd, the sharp extremity of which is the peak or bill; at the other end of the shank is the stock ee, a transverse piece, behind which is a shackle or ring, to which a cable can be attached. The principal use of the stock is to cause the arms to fall so as one of the flukes shall enter the ground. According to their various forms and uses, anchors obtain the epithets of the sheet, best bower, small bower, spare, stream, kedg, and grappling or grapnel. Those of the largest size carried by men-of-war are the best and small bowers, the sheet, and the spare; to which are added the stream and the kedg, which are used for particular or for temporary purposes. The number and weight of anchors ought to bear a proper relation to the size of the ship. Many improvements and novelties in the shape and construction of anchors have been introduced within recent times. The principal names connected with those alterations are those of Lieut. Rodgers, who introduced the hollow-shanked anchor with the view of increasing the strength without adding to the weight; Mr. Porter, who made the arms and flukes movable by pivoting them to the stock instead of fixing them immovably, causing the anchor to take a readier and firmer hold, and avoiding the chance of the cable becoming foul; Mr. Trotman, who has further improved on Porter's invention; and M. Martin, whose anchor is of very peculiar form, and is constructed so as to be self-canting, the arms revolving through an angle of 30° either way, and the sharp points of the flukes being always ready to enter the ground. — The anchor is said to be a cock-bill when it is suspended vertically from the cat-head, ready to be let go; a peak, when it is drawn in so tight as to bring the ship directly over it; a trip or a-weight, when it is just drawn out of the ground in a perpendicular direction; a wash, when the stock is hove up to the surface of the water. — Floating anchor, an apparatus variously constructed, for being sunk below the swell of the sea, where there is no anchorage, to prevent a vessel from drifting. — Foul anchor. See FOUL, a. — Mooring anchor, a large heavy mass placed at the bottom of the water, in a harbour or roadstead, to which ships may be attached by a cable. — To back an anchor. See under BACK, v.t. — To cat the anchor, to draw the anchor perpendicularly up to the cat-head by a strong tackle called the cat. — To flash the anchor, to hoist and draw up the flukes of a ship's anchor towards the top of the bow by a machine called a flash, in order to stow it after it has been catted. — To weigh the anchor, to heave or raise it from the ground. 2. Something serving a purpose analogous to that of a ship's anchor; as, (a) the apparatus at the opposite end of the field from the engine of a steam-plough, and to which pulleys are fixed, round which the endless band or rope that moves the plough passes. (b) The means by which the extremities of the chains or wire-ropes of a suspension bridge are attached to the shore. — 3. Fig. that which gives stability or security; that on which we place dependence for safety.

Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast. Heb. vi. 19.

4. In arch, an ornament shaped somewhat like an anchor or arrow-head. It is used along with the egg ornament, and the combination is popularly called egg-and-dart or egg-and-tongue. See ECHINUS, 4. — Anchor escapement. See ESCAPEMENT. Anchor (ang'kér), v.t. 1. To hold at rest by lowering the anchor; to place at anchor; as, to anchor a ship. — 2. Fig. to fix or fasten on; to fix in a stable condition.

Let us anchor our hopes . . . upon his goodness. South.

Anchor (ang'kér), v.i. 1. To cast anchor; to come to anchor; as, our ship anchored off the Isle of Wight. — 2. Fig. to keep hold in any way.

Posthumus anchors upon Imogen. Shak.

Anchor (ang'kér), n. Same as Anchore. An anchor's cheer in prison be my scope! Shak.

Anchorable (ang'kér-a-bl), a. Fit for anchorage. 'The sea everywhere twenty leagues from land anchorable.' Sir T. Herbert.

Anchorage (ang'kér-áj), n. 1. Anchoring ground; a place where a ship can anchor, where the ground is not too rocky, nor the water too deep nor too shallow.

The fleet returned to its former anchorage Southey.

2. The hold of a ship at anchor.

If that supposal should fail us, all our anchorage were loose, and we should but wander in a wild sea. Wotton.

3. The anchor and all the necessary tackle for anchoring. [Rare.]

The bark that hath discharged her freight, Returns with precious lading to the bay From whence, at first, she weighed her anchorage. Shak.

4. A duty imposed on ships for anchoring in a harbour.

This corporation, otherwise a poor one, holds also the anchorage in the harbour. Rich. Carrer.

Anchor-ball (ang'kér-bal), n. A pyrotechnical combustible attached to a grapnel for adhering to and setting fire to ships.

Anchor-bolt (ang'kér-bólt), n. A bolt with an expanded shank to prevent its being drawn out. E. H. Knight.

Anchor-chock (ang'kér-chok), n. A piece indented into a wooden anchor-stock where it has become worn or defective; also, a piece of wood or iron on which an anchor rests when it is stowed.

Anchor-drag (ang'kér-drag), n. Same as Drag-chock.

Anchored (ang'kér-d), p and a. 1. Held at rest by an anchor. — 2. Shaped like an anchor; fluked; forked.

Her anchored tongue Threatening her venom'd teeth. Dr. H. More.

3. In her, the term applied to a cross whose extremities are turned back like the flukes of an anchor: In this sense written also Anchry, Ancrie, Ancred.

Anchoress, Anchoretess (ang'kó-res, ang'kó-rít-es), n. A female anchoret.

And there a saintly anchoretess she dwelt. Wordsworth.

Pega, his sister, an anchoretess, led a solitary life. Fuller.

Anchoret, Anchorite (ang'kó-ret, ang'kó-rít), n. [L. anchoretta; Gr. anachoretis — ana, back, and choreo, to make room for, retire, from choros, a place.] A hermit; a recluse; one who retires from society into a desert or solitary place, to avoid the temptations of the world and devote himself to religious duties; specifically, a monk who, with the leave of the abbot, retires to a cave or cell, with an allowance from the monastery, to live in solitude. 'Macarius, the great Egyptian anchoret.' Abp. Usher.

Our Saviour himself did not choose an anchoret's or a monastic life, but a social and amiable way of conversing with mortals. Boyle.

Anchoretic, Anchoretical (ang'kó-ret'ik, ang'kó-ret'ik-al), a. Pertaining to a hermit, or his mode of life.

Anchor-gate (ang'kér-gát), n. A heavy gate such as is used in canals, having for its upper bearing a collar embedded in the adjacent masonry.

Anchor-hold (ang'kér-hóld), n. The hold or fastness of an anchor; security. 'The one and only assurance and fast anchor-hold of our souls' health.' Camden.

Anchor-ice (ang'kér-ís), n. The ice which is formed on and incrusts the beds of lakes and rivers; ground-ice.

Anchoring (ang'kér-ing), p and a. Held at rest by the anchor; riding or lying at anchor. 'You tall anchoring bark.' Shak.

Anchorite, n. See ANCHORET.

Anchorites, n. See ANCHORESS.

Anchoritical (ang'kó-rít'ik-al), a. Pertaining to an anchorite or hermit, or to his mode of life.

Anchor-lining (ang'kér-lín-ing), n. Same as Bill-board. See BILL-BOARD.

Anchor-tripper (ang'kér-tríp-er), n. A device for tripping or casting loose a ship's anchor.

Anchor-watch (ang'kér-woch), n. Naut. a subdivision of the watch kept constantly on deck during the time the ship lies at single anchor, to be in readiness to hoist jib or stay sails to keep the ship clear of her anchor, or to veer more cable, or let go another anchor in case she should drive or part her anchor. This watch is also in readiness to avoid collision in close rivers, by veering cable, setting sail, using the helm, &c.

Anchovy (an-chó'vi), n. [Pg. and Sp. anchova, an anchovy, referred by Mahon to Basque anchua, anchusa, dry.] An abdominal malacopterygious fish of the genus Engraulis, family Clupeidae. The species are all of diminutive size, and, with exception of the common anchovy (E. encrasicolus) and E. mellea (both Mediterranean species), inhabitants of the tropical seas of India and America. The common anchovy, so esteemed for its rich and peculiar flavour, is not much larger than the middle finger. It is caught in vast numbers in the Mediterranean, and pickled for exportation. A sauce, held in much esteem, is made from anchovies by pounding them in water, straining the mixture for a short time, adding a little cayenne pepper, and straining the whole through a hair-sieve.

Anchovy-pear (an-chó'vi-pár), n. A fruit of Jamaica, produced by a species of the genus Grias (G. cauliflora). It is large, and contains generally a single seed protected by a stony covering. It is pickled and eaten like mango.

Anchry (ang'kri), a. In her, same as Anchored, 3.

Anchusa (ang'kú'sa), n. [Gr. anchousa, alkanet.] A genus of plants, nat. order Boraginaceae. The species are chiefly inhabitants of the temperate parts of the earth, either on the mountains of tropical climates or the temperate zones. A. officinalis (common alkanet or bugloss) and A. sempervivens are inhabitants of Britain. The Anchusa tinctoria of some botanists is the same as Alkanna tinctoria. See ALKANET.

Anchusine, Anchusine (ang'kú'sín), n. The name given to a red colouring matter obtained from Anchusa (Alkanna) tinctoria. It is resinous, and emits violet vapours when heated.

Anchylosed (ang'ki-lóe), v.t. A common, but erroneous, spelling of Ankylosed (which see). Anchylosed (ang'ki-lóet), p. Same as Ankylosed.

turns. Others suggest hand-iron, end-iron. A horizontal iron bar raised on short legs, with an upright standard at one end, used to support pieces of wood when burning on an open hearth, one being placed on each side of the hearth. The standards usually ended with a round knob at top, and were kept brightly polished; those for kitchen use had catches for holding the roasting-spit; others were richly ornamented with copper and silver work.

Her andirens
(I had forgot them) were two winking Cupids
Of silver, each on one foot standing, nicely
Depending on their brands. Shak.

Called also Fire-dog and End-iron.

Andra (an'dra), n. A North African species of gazelle.

Andranatomy (an-dra-nat'-o-mi), n. [Gr. anēr, andros, a man, and anatomē, dissection.] The dissection of a human body, especially of a male; androtoomy.

Andresaceae (an-drē'-ā'-sē-ē), n. pl. [After J. Andres, a German botanist.] A nat. order, or, according to some, a distinct tribe of mosses. They do not, however, differ essentially from the true mosses, being distinguished mainly by the longitudinal splitting of the valves at maturity. The plants are mostly alpine, and four are found in Britain. All the species are of a peculiar dark hue, and the leaves, which are of a close texture, are of a beautiful yellow or golden brown under the microscope.

Andrenidae (an-dren'-idē), n. pl. [Typical genus Andrena, from Gr. anthrēnē, a bee.] A family of solitary bees in which the tongue is short and the chin elongated. The female forms burrows in sandy ground, provisioning them with pollen and honey, in the midst of which she deposits her eggs. Every nest contains several such masses, each provided with an egg, and separated from its neighbours by small partitions of earth. The Andrenidae consist only of males and females.

Andreolite (an'dre-o-lit'), n. A mineral, harmotome or cross-stone. See CROSS-STONE.

Androedum (an-drē'al-um), n. [Gr. anēr, andros, a man, a male, and oikos, a house.] In bot. the male system of a flower; the assemblage of the stamens.

Androgynal, Androgynous (an-drof'in-al, an-drof'in-us), a. [Gr. androgynos—common to man and woman—anēr, andros, a man, and gynē, woman.] 1. Having two sexes; being male and female; hermaphroditical. (a) In bot. having male and female flowers in the same inflorescence, as in some species of Carex. (b) In zool. applied to animals with both sexes in the same individual, as the snail.—2. Having or partaking of the mental characteristics of both sexes.

The truth is, a great mind must be androgynous.
Coleridge.

Androgynally (an-drof'in-al-ly), adv. With the parts of both sexes. Sir T. Browne.

Androgynist (an-drof'in-ist), n. [Fr., from Gr. anēr, andros, a man, and gynē, a woman.] An hermaphrodite.

Plato . . . tells a story how that at first there were three kinds of men, that is, male, female, and a third mixt species of the other two, called, for that reason, androgynus. Chalmers.

What shall I say of these vile and stinking androgyns, that is to say, these men-women, with their curled locks, their crisped and frizzled hair! Harmar.

Android, Androides (an'droid, an-droi'déz), n. [Gr. anēr, andros, a man, and eidōs, form.] A machine in the human form, which, by certain springs, imitates some of the natural motions of a living man.

Andromeda (an-drom'e-da), n. [Andromeda, daughter of Cepheus king of Ethiopia, and wife of Perseus; after death placed as a constellation in the heavens.] 1. A northern constellation, behind Pegasus, Cassiopeia, and Perseus, supposed to represent the figure of a woman chained. The stars in this constellation in Flamsteed's catalogue are eighty-four.—2. A genus of plants, nat. order Ericaceae. The species are hardy shrubs or trees, natives of Europe, Asia, and North America. A. polifolia is found in peat bogs in Britain; it is an acrid narcotic, hurtful to sheep. Narcotic properties have also been observed in several foreign species. A. floribunda is an evergreen ornamental shrub cultivated in gardens.

Andron (an'dron), n. [Gr. andrōn, from anēr, andros, a man.] In Greek antiq. the apartment in a dwelling-house appropriated to males. It was in the lower part of the house.

Andropetalous (an-drō-pē'tal-us), a. [Gr. anēr, andros, a man, and petalon, a petal.] In bot. an epithet applied to double flowers produced by the conversion of the stamens into petals, as in the garden ranunculus.

Androphagi (an-drof'a-i), n. [Gr. anēr, andros, a man, and phagō, to eat.] Man-eaters; anthropophagi.

Androphagous (an-drof'a-gus), a. Pertaining to or addicted to cannibalism.

Androphore (an'dro-fōr'), n. [Gr. anēr, andros, a man, and phērō, to bear.] 1. In bot. a stalk supporting the stamens, often formed by a union of the filaments.—2. In zool. the medusiform zooid in which the male elements are developed, and which differs in form from the gynophore, or that bearing the female elements.

Andropogon (an-drō-pō'gōn), n. [Gr. anēr, andros, a man, and pōgōn, the beard.] A large genus of grasses, mostly natives of warm countries. A lemon-scented fragrant oil is yielded by A. Schoenanthus, the sweet-scented ginger or lemon-grass of Malabar and our conservatories. A. muricatus, the Indian khus, is used to make covers for palanquins, screens, &c., and yields a fragrant attar called khus-khus. Ginger-grass oil is obtained from A. Nardus.

Androsphinx (an'drō-sfingks), n. [Gr. anēr, andros, a man, and sphinx, a sphinx.] In anc. sculp. a sphinx with a human head, as distinguished from one with the head of a ram or a hawk. See SPHINX.

Androspore (an'drō-spōr'), n. [Gr. anēr, andros, a man, and sporē, seed.] In bot. a spore of some algae, from which proceed a large number of small bodies having male functions.

Androtoomy (an-dro'to-mi), n. [Gr. anēr, andros, a man, and tomē, a cutting.] Dissection of the human body, as distinguished from zootomy.

Androus (an'drus), a. [Gr. anēr, andros, a man.] In bot. producing stamens only, without pistils; staminate; male.

Anéal (a-nēl'), v. t. Same as Anelo.

Anear (a-nēr'), adv. or prep. Near.

Dark-browed sophist, come not anear. Tennyson.
Much more is needed, so that at last the measure of misery anear us may be correctly taken.

J. Taylor.
Anecdotalage (an'ek-dōt-āj), n. 1. Anecdotes collectively; matter of the nature of anecdotes. [Rare.]

All history, therefore, being built partly, and some of it altogether, upon anecdotalage, must be a tissue of lies. Dr. Quincy.

2. [With a punning allusion to dotage.] The later part of one's life, when he is supposed to be garrulous and fond of telling anecdotes. [Colloq.]

Anecdotal (an'ek-dōt-al), a. Pertaining to or consisting of anecdotes. 'Conversation, argumentative or declamatory, narrative or anecdotal.' Prof. Wilson.

Anecdote (an'ek-dōt'), n. [Gr. anekdotos, not published—a, neg. ek, out, and dotos, given, from didōmi, to give.] A short story or narrative, being the relation of a particular or detached incident or fact of an interesting nature; a biographical incident; a single passage of private life.—Anecdote, Story. An anecdote is the relation of an interesting or amusing incident, generally of a private nature, and is always reported as true. A story may be true or fictitious, and generally has reference to a series of incidents so arranged and related as to be entertaining.

Anecdotic, Anecdotal (an-ek-dōt'ik, an-ek-dōt'ik-al), a. Pertaining to anecdotes; consisting of or of the nature of anecdotes; anecdotal. 'Anecdotal traditions, whose authority is unknown.' Bolingbroke.

Anecdotalist (an'ek-dōt-ist), n. One who deals in anecdotes.

Anelace, Anlace (an'e-lās, an'lās), n. [Possibly O.H.G. an, on, and laz, the side.] A broad knife or dagger, from 18 inches to 2 feet long, worn at the girdle. It appears to have been used from an early period.

1, Anelace (time of Edward IV.). 2, Anelace (time of Henry VII.).

Anele (a-nēl'), v. t. pret. & pp. aneled; ppr. aneeling. [A Sax. onelan, to anoint—prefix on, and ele, oil.] To administer extreme unction to.

He was hounded and aneled, and had all that a Christian man ought to have. Martin d'Archer.

Anelectric (an-ē-lek'trik), a. [Gr. an, priv., and E. electric (which see).] Having no electric properties; non-electric.

Anelectrode (an-ē-lek'trōd'), n. The positive pole of a galvanic battery. See ELEKTRODE.

Anemograph (a-nēm'-o'-graf'), n. [Gr. anemos, the wind, and graphō, to write, to describe.] An instrument for measuring and recording the force and direction of the wind.

Anemography (an-e-mog'ra-fi), n. [See ANEMOGRAPH.] A description of the winds.

Anemology (an-e-mol'o-jī), n. [Gr. anemos, wind, and logos, discourse.] The doctrine of or a treatise on winds.

Anemometer (an-e-mom'-et-ēr'), n. [Gr. anemos, wind, and metron, a measure.] An instrument or machine for measuring the force and velocity of the wind. There are various kinds of anemometers, as Lind's, Osler's, Robinson's. Casella, by an elaborate combination of Robinson's, with some more recent modifications, has produced an instrument capable of registering the direction and velocity of the wind with greater precision than any of its predecessors. The engraving shows Robinson's anemometer in its simplest form. Four hemispherical hollow cups A are extended upon strong metal arms, with their concave surfaces facing the same way, upon a vertical axis B, which has at its lower extremity an endless screw C. The axis is strengthened and supported at D. The endless screw is placed in gear with a train of wheel-work; and the indication is given by a hand which moves round a dial, or, in some instruments, by several hands moving round different dials like those of a gas-meter.

Anemometry (an-e-mom-et-ri), n. The process of determining the pressure or force of the wind by means of an anemometer.

Anemone (a-nēm'o-ne), n. [Gr. anemōnē, the wind-flower, from anemos, the wind; so named from being easily stripped of its petals by the wind.] Wind-flower, a genus of plants, nat. order Ranunculaceae. Three species occur in Britain. The wood anemone (A. nemorosa) is the only one truly native; it has white flowers, sometimes tinged with purple on the outside. A ranunculoid, a common European plant, naturalized in a few places in Britain, has bright yellow flowers, but is otherwise like the wood anemone. A. hepatica, a native of southern Europe, also naturalized in a few British localities, has the flowers bright blue on the inside of the sepal, which are narrow and more numerous than in the other two, the root-stalk is also shorter and thicker. Some species are cultivated in gardens for their elegant double flowers. A. nemorosa, vine-leaved anemone, a native of Nepal, with its charming foliage and the freshness of its large pure white flower, is one of the loveliest of all our garden plants. — See anemone. See ACTINIA.

Anemone (an-e-mo'ne) a. Of or pertaining to anemone, obtained from anemone, an anemone acid, an acid obtained by the action of baryta upon anemone.

Anemone, Anemone (a-nem'o-ne) a. A crystalline substance extracted from some species of anemone.

Anemone (a-nem'o-ne) a. Same as Anemone.

Anemophilous (an-e-mo'fi-us) a. [Or anemo-, the wind, and philos, to love.] Lit. loving the wind, specifically, in bot. denoting flowers whose pollen is conveyed from the anther to the stigma by the agency of the wind; contradistinguished from entomophilous (which see). See.

Anemoscope (a-nem'o-skop) a. [Or anemo-, wind, and skopos, to view.] A contrivance which shows the direction of the wind, a weathercock, a wind-vane, especially, a contrivance for conveying the indications of the vane to a dial in a chamber on the ground.

Anemone (an-e-mo'ne) a. [Or anemo-, the wind, in bot. the condition of being wind-shaken, an occasional condition of the timber of exogenous trees, in which the annual layers are separated from each other, caused, it is supposed, by the action of strong gales. Many doubt, however, whether the condition is due to wind, and believe that it should be referred rather to frost or lightning.]

Anem (an-em) a. [An, on, and end.] 1. On end, in an upright position. 'Make each particular hair to stand anem.'

Shel. [Hardly used now except as a nautical term.] — 2. Lastly.

Anem (a-nem) prep. [O E and Sc.] Same as Anem. 'And right anem him a dog curlew.' B. Jonson.

Anem (a-nem) prep. [Also written anem, anem, in O E. anem, anem, anem, anem, from a Sax. an, on, over; that is, on even. Comp. O on even (lit. on even), anem, anem, by the side of. The termination is similar to that in anem, anem.] Opposite, over against, as, he lives anem the town-house. (Provincial English and Scotch.) — 2. Above, respecting. (Old English and Scotch.)

I cannot but pass you my judgment anem those six considerations which you offered to invalidate those assertions that I so much revere.

King Charles I.
Anged is a Scotch word which has been made English by the Scotch poets.
Byron.

Anemone (an-e-mo'ne) a. [See ANEMONE.] An obsolete name for the Infamia, from a belief that they had several stomachs round the mouth but no intestine.

Anemone (an-e-mo'ne) a. [Or an, priv., and em, em, em, from em, within.] Duetate of intestine, having no alimentary canal.

Such aspects have no intestine, no anem, and are not to be considered.

Anemoid (an-e-mo'id) a. Same as Anemoid (which see).

Anemoid (an-e-mo'id) a. [Or a, priv., anemo-, anemo-, and anemo-, from containing no mercury or other fluid.] Dispensing with fluid, as with quicksilver. Anemoid barometer, an instrument for indicating the pressure of the atmosphere, the invention of M. Vidi of Paris, for whom a patent was obtained in England by M. Fontaine-Morand in 1844. It answers the purpose of the ordinary mercurial barometer, but less perfectly. It is, however, very handy and portable. The engraving represents the latest improved mechanism of an anemoid. The outer casing and face of the instrument are removed, but the index hand is left attached to the arbor. A is the corrugated vacuum box, which has been exhausted of air through the tube J. B is a powerful spring resting in gudgeons fixed in the base-plate, and attached to a socket behind F. A lever C, joined to the edge of the spring A, is connected by the bent lever at B with the chain K, the other end of which is coiled round the arbor F. As the box A is compressed by the weight of the atmosphere increasing, the spring B is tightened, the lever C depressed, and the chain K uncoiled from F, which is thereby turned so that the hand H moves to the right. In the meanwhile the spiral spring G, coiled round F, is compressed. When, therefore, the pressure decreases, A and B relax by virtue of their elasticity, B slackens, G winds, turning F, which carries the index hand H to the left.

Anem (an, an, yin), adv. Once. [Scotch.] Anem-errand (an-em'er-rand), adv. Of set purpose, as, or on, a sole errand, entirely on purpose. [Scotch.]

Anemethia (an-e-thé'ti-a) a. Same as Anemethia.

Anemethic (an-e-thé'tik) a. Same as Anemethic.

Anemum (a-né'thum) a. [Or anem, and num, to burn.] A genus of plants, natural order Umbelliferae. A. graveolens is the common dill. See DILL.

Anem (a-nem) a. adv. or a. Enough. [Scotch.]

Anemism (an-e-rism) a. [Or anemism, anemism, a widening, anem, up, and ism, wide.] In med. the swelling of an artery, or the dilatation and expansion of some part of an artery. Anemism arises partly from the too violent action of the blood, partly from excessive debility of the membrane of the artery, which is sometimes constitutional. They are therefore more frequent in the great branches of the arteries, in particular, in the vicinity of the heart, in the arch of the aorta, and in the extremities, for instance, in the ham and at the ribs, where the arteries are exposed to frequent injuries by stretching, violent bodily exertions, thrusts, falls, and contusions.

Anemismal (an-e-rism'al) a. Pertaining to an anemism, as, an anemismal tumour. Anem (a-nem) adv. [From an, of or on, and em.] Over again, in a new form, afresh; as, to anem once, to create anew.

Anemism (an-e-rism) a. [See ANEMISM.] In bot. twisted or sinuous, as the anemism of a cucumber.

Anemism (an-e-rism) a. 1. A state of being anemism or full of windings and turnings. 'The anemism of his intellect and temper.' Macaulay. — 2. In med. a sinuous depression like the depression separating the convolutions of the brain.

Anemism (an-e-rism) a. [L. anemism, broken or bent round — an for anem, round, and ism, from anemism, to break.] Winding, full of windings and turnings; sinuous. 'The anemism passages of the brain.' Smith.

Anemism (an-e-rism) a. [L. anemism, broken or bent round — an for anem, round, and ism, from anemism, to break.] Winding, full of windings and turnings; sinuous. 'The anemism passages of the brain.' Smith.

Anemism (an-e-rism) a. [L. anemism, broken or bent round — an for anem, round, and ism, from anemism, to break.] Winding, full of windings and turnings; sinuous. 'The anemism passages of the brain.' Smith.

Anemism (an-e-rism) a. [L. anemism, broken or bent round — an for anem, round, and ism, from anemism, to break.] Winding, full of windings and turnings; sinuous. 'The anemism passages of the brain.' Smith.

Anemism (an-e-rism) a. [L. anemism, broken or bent round — an for anem, round, and ism, from anemism, to break.] Winding, full of windings and turnings; sinuous. 'The anemism passages of the brain.' Smith.

The earth yields us fruit, not without much cost and anemism, requiring both our labour and patience.

Angel (an-jel) a. [L. angelus, or angelus, a messenger, from angelus, to tell or announce.] 1. A messenger.

The dove good angel of the spring.
The nightingale B. Jonson.

2. A spiritual being employed by God in human affairs; usually applied to a good spirit, but sometimes to an evil spirit.

Angels are bright still, though the brightest fall.
They had a king over them, which is the chief of the bottomless pit. Rev. in. 18.

3. A person, generally a woman, of adorable qualities.

See, as I have a need, she is an angel. Shak.

4. A gold coin, formerly current in England, varying in value from 6s. 8d. to 10s., so called from its bearing on its obverse a figure of the archangel Michael piercing a dragon. It continued to be coined down to the time of the Commonwealth.

Come, away for England, haste before, and, ere our coming, see these shake the bags of hoarding shob, angels in pressed not those at liberty. Shak.

Angel (an-jel) a. Resembling angel; angelic. 'In angel whiteness.' Shak.

Angelage (an-jel-ij) n. Existence or state of angel. Beau & Fl.

Angel-bed (an-jel-bed) n. An open bed without posts.

Anglet (an-jel-et) n. 1. An old English gold coin, equal to half an angel. See ANGLET. — 2. A little or young angel. [Rare.]

And with the notes of those subdued soundings the angelic spring forth, uttering its rudiments of plains. Land.

Angel-fish (an-jel-fish) a. A planktonous fish, Squatina angelus, nearly allied to the shark, very ugly and voracious, preying on other fish. It is from 6 to 8 feet long, with a large head, teeth broad at the base, but slender and sharp above, disposed in five rows all around the jaws. The fish takes its name from its pectoral fins, which are very large, extending horizontally like wings when spread. This fish connects the genus of rays with that of sharks, partaking of the characters of both; but it differs from both in this, that its mouth is placed at the extremity of the head. It is common on the south coast of Britain, and is also called North-fish and Piddle-fish.

Angel-gold (an-jel-gold) n. 1. Gold used for coining angels, of a finer quality than crown-gold. — 2. Gold coin stamped with the figure of an angel.

Having angel-gold, strong on white ribbon, on his arm. Fielder.

Angelic, Angelic (an-jel'ik, an-jel'ik-al) a. Resembling or belonging to, or partaking of, or suitable to, the nature and dignity of angels.

Here, happy creatures, like angelic Eve. Milton.
Others were mild, Retreated in a silent valley, sing, With notes angelical to many a happy Milton.

Angelic (an-jel'ik) a. [From the supposed angelic virtues possessed by some of the species, for not only were they believed to be a remedy against poison, the plague, all kinds of infection, and malaria, but they were believed to be invaluable against witchcraft and enchantments.] 1. A genus of umbelliferous plants found in the northern temperate regions and in New Zealand. One species, A. sylvestris, common in Britain, was formerly greatly prized for its supposed virtues. Its powdered seeds are used in some parts of Europe to kill lice, and its roots and seeds are used in preparing gin and bitters. — 2. The garden name for Archangelica officinalis, a native of the banks of rivers and was ditched in the northern parts of Europe, and found naturalized in similar situations in England. It has a large fleshy aromatic root, and a strong-furrowed branched stem as high as a man. It is cultivated on the Continent for the sake of its agreeable aromatic odour and carminative properties. Its blanched stems, candied with sugar, form a very agreeable sweetmeat, possessing tonic and stomachic qualities. The roots were formerly employed in scrofulous diseases, as diuretics and sudorifics.

Angelically (an-jel'ik-al-li), adv. In an angelic manner; like an angel.

Angelicalness (an-jel'ik-al-nes), n. The quality of being angelic; the nature or character of an angel; excellence more than human.

Angelica-tree (an-jel'ik-a-tré), n. The American name of Aralia spinosa, nat. order Araliaceæ (which see), a prickly, small, simple-stemmed tree, 8 to 12 feet high, the berries of which are used in an infusion of wine or spirits for relieving rheumatic pains and violent colic.

Angelicide (an-jel'ik-siz), v.t. To make angelic or like an angel.

Angelify (an-jel'ik-fi), v.t. To make like an angel. 'The soul . . . refined and angelified.' Farrington.

Angelite (an-jel'it), n. [So called from Angelium in Alexandria, where the first meetings were held.] Eccles. one of a sect of heretics near the close of the fifth century, who held the persons of the Trinity not to be the same, nor to exist by their own nature, but each to be a God, existing by participating of a deity common to them all.

Angelize (an-jel'iz), v.t. To make an angel of; to raise to the state of an angel.

David alone, whom with heav'n's love surpris'd,
To praise thee there, thou now hast angelic'd.
Spenser, Du Bartas.

Angelology (an-jel-o-l'j-i), n. [Angel, and Gr. logos.] A discourse on angels, or the doctrine of angelic beings. [Rare.]

The same mythology commanded the general consent; the same angelology, demonology. Milman.

Angelophany (an-jel-o-f'a-ni), n. [Angel, and Gr. phaino, to appear.] The manifestation of an angel or angels to man by actual appearance.

If God seeks to commune more fully with a man, his messenger appears and speaks to him. The narratives of such angelophanies vary in detail. Prof. W. R. Smith.

Angelot (an-jel'ot), n. [Fr., from L.L. angelotus, dim. of angelus, an angel.] 1. An ancient English coin, of the value of half an angel, struck at Paris while under the dominion of England; so called from the figure of an angel supporting the escutcheon of the arms of England and France.—2. A small rich sort of cheese made in Normandy, so called because it formerly bore the figure of the coin, probably to indicate its price.—3. An instrument of music somewhat resembling a lute.

Angel-shot (an-jel'shot), n. [Fr. ange, an angel, also a chain-shot. The latter sense is probably a grimly humorous modification of that of heavenly messenger.] Chain-shot (which see under CHAIN).

Angelus (an-jel'us), n. In the Rom. Cath. Ch. (a) a solemn devotion in memory of the incarnation, consisting mainly of versicles and responses, the angelic salutation three times repeated, and a collect, so named from the word with which it commences, 'Angelus Domini' (Angel of the Lord). (b) The bell tolled in the morning, at noon, and in the evening to indicate to the faithful the time when the angelus is to be recited.

Angel-water (an-jel-wa-tér), n. A mixture of rose, orange-flower, and myrtle water, musk and ambergris, used as a perfume and cosmetic in the seventeenth century.

I met the prettiest creature in New Spring Garden.
... Angel-water was the worst scent about her.
Sedley.

Anger (ang'jer), n. [From a widely-spread root, ang, expressive of compression, tightness, and hence annoyance, distress. The word entered English apparently from the Scandinavian; comp. Icel. angr, grief, sorrow, angra, to grieve, annoy, or make angry; Dan. anger, sorrow, repentance; the same root also appears in A. Sax. ange, vexation; Goth. aggvus, G. enge, narrow; L. ango, to squeeze, to trouble, angor, vexation, angustus, narrow (whence anguish); Gr. angchô, to choke.] 1. Pain or smart, as of a sore or swelling.

I made the experiment, setting the moxa where the first violence of my pain began, and where the greatest anger and soreness still continued.
Sir W. Temple.

2. Grief; sorrow; trouble. [Old English.] 3. A violent passion or emotion of the mind, excited by a real or supposed injury to one's self or others.

Anger, is, according to some, a transient hatred, or at least very like it. South.

4. An individual fit of anger; an expression of anger, as a threat; in this sense it may be used in the plural.

Whose voices, angery, and terrors, and sometimes howlings also, he said to be often heard. Abb. Ulster.

—Anger, Wrath. Anger is a sudden, keen feeling of displeasure arising from injury, real or supposed, done to ourselves or others. It is not necessarily accompanied by any outward manifestation. Wrath is a stronger feeling of this nature, and is accompanied by external signs and a desire to take vengeance. Wrath often implies a forgetfulness of the consequences to ourselves and others of what we do while under its influence.—SYN. Resentment, wrath, rage, fury, passion, ire, gall, choler, indignation, displeasure, vexation, grudge, spleen.

Anger (ang'jer), v.t. 1. To make painful; to cause to smart; to inflame; as, to anger an ulcer. Bacon.—2. To excite to anger; to rouse resentment in.

There were some late taxes and impositions introduced, which rather angered than grieved the people. Clarendon.

SYN. To irritate, enrage, inflame, provoke, exasperate, rouse, incite.

Angerly (ang'jer-li), adv. In an angry manner; angrily.

Then in madness and in bliss.

If my lips should dare to kiss

Thy taper fingers amorously,

Again thou bluesthest angrily. Tennyson.

Angerness (ang'jer-nes), n. The state of being angry. 'Hail, innocent of angerness.' MS. cited by T. Warton.

Angina (an-j'i-na), n. [L. from ango, to choke. See ANGUR.] In med. any inflammatory affection of the throat or fauces, as quinsy, malignant sore throat, croup, mumps, &c.

—Angina pectoris, a disease characterized by an extremely acute constriction felt generally in the lower part of the sternum, and extending along the whole side of the chest and into the corresponding arm. It is usually brought on by violent exercise, excessive eating, or strong mental emotion, and has been known to result from excessive use of tobacco. It often proves fatal. Called also Breast-pang.

Angiocarpous (an-j'i-ô-kâr'pus), a. [Gr. angion, a case or capsule, and karpos, fruit.] In bot. (a) having a fruit whose seed-vessels are inclosed within a covering that does not form a part of themselves, as the flibert covered by its husk, or the acorn seated in its cupule. (b) Having the seeds or spores covered, as certain lichens.

Angiography (an-j'i-ô-gr'a-fi), n. [Gr. angion, a vessel, and graphê, description.] In med. a description of the vessels of the human body.

Angiology (an-j'i-ô-l'j-i), n. [Gr. angion, a vessel, and logos, discourse.] In med. a treatise or discourse on the vessels of the human body, as the arteries, veins, lymphatics, &c.

Angiomonospermous (an-j'i-ô-mon'ô-spér'm'us), a. [Gr. angion, a vessel, monos, alone, and sperma, seed.] In bot. producing one seed only in a pod.

Angiopteris (an-j'i-ô-ptér'is), n. [Gr. angion, a vessel, and ptéris, a fern.] A genus of ferns, nat. order Marattiaceæ, found in India, Ceylon, and the islands of the Eastern Archipelago, some of whose species are cultivated in our hot-houses. A. evecta, the original species, is used by the Sandwich Islanders to perfume their cocoa-nut oil.

Angioscope (an-j'i-ô-skóp), n. [Gr. angion, a vessel, and skopô, to view.] An instrument for examining the capillary vessels of a body.

Angiosperm (an-j'i-ô-spér'm'), n. [Gr. angion, a vessel, and sperma, seed.] In bot. a plant which has its seeds inclosed in a seed-vessel. In modern classification exogens are divided into those whose seeds are inclosed in a seed-vessel, and those with seeds produced and ripened without the production of a seed-vessel. The former are angiosperms, and constitute the principal part of the species; the latter are gymnosperms, and chiefly consist of the Coniferae and Cycadaceæ.

Angiospermia (an-j'i-ô-spér'm'i-a), n. pl. [See ANGIOSPERM.] The second order of the Linnean class Didynamia, having numerous seeds inclosed in an obvious seed-vessel, as in Digitalis.

Angiospermous (an-j'i-ô-spér'm'us), a. Having seeds inclosed in a seed-vessel, such as the pea, apple, and the great mass of flowering plants; opposed to gymnospermous, or naked-seeded.

Angiosporous (an-j'i-ô-spó-rus), a. [Gr. angion, a vessel, and spora, a seed.] In bot. a term applied to such fungi as have their spores inclosed in a bag, as Lycoperdon.

Angiotomy (an-j'i-ô-tó-mi), n. [Gr. angion, a vessel, and tómê, a cutting.] In anat. dissection of the vessels of a body, especially of the human body.

Angle (ang'gl), n. [L. angulus, a corner.] The point where two lines meet, or the meeting of two lines in a point; a corner. In geom. a plain rectilinear angle is the mutual inclination of two straight lines which meet one another, but are not in the same straight line; or a rectilinear angle is the degree of opening or divergence of two straight lines which meet one another. The point where the lines meet is called the vertex of the angle or the angular point, and the lines which contain the angle are called its sides or legs. A clear idea of the nature of an angle is obtained by gradually opening a carpenter's rule or a pair of compasses, as the angle made by the parts of the rule or the legs of the compasses will become greater as the opening widens. It is evident that the magnitude of the angle does not depend upon the length of the lines which form it, but merely on their relative positions. An angle is best named by a single letter placed at its vertex, unless there be more angles than one at the same point. In this case the angle is generally expressed by three letters, the middle one of which is placed at the vertex or angular point, and the other two at some other point of the lines containing it. Thus, in fig. 1, the angle contained by A B and B C may be called the angle B, or the angle at B; but in fig. 2, where there are more angles than one at the point B, the angle contained by B D and D B is called the angle B D A. Angles are measured by an arc of a circle, described from the vertex with any radius: thus the arc D E (fig. 1), described from B as a centre, is a measure of the angle A B C, and the angle A B C is said to be an angle of as many degrees, and parts of a degree, as there are in the arc D E, a circle being always supposed to be divided into 360 degrees. (See ARC and CIRCLE.) Angles receive different names, according to their magnitude, their construction, their position, and the different branches of science in which they are employed. A right angle is an angle formed by a straight or right line falling on another perpendicularly, or an angle which is measured by an arc of 90 degrees. When a straight line, as A B (fig. 3), standing on another straight line C D, makes the two angles A B C and A B D equal to one another, each of these angles is called a right angle. An acute angle is that which is less than a right angle, as B C C. An obtuse angle is that which is greater than a right angle, as B E D. Acute and obtuse angles are both called oblique, in opposition to right angles. A rectilinear angle is that which is formed by two straight lines. A curvilinear angle is formed by two curved lines. A mixed angle is formed by a straight line with a curved line. A adjacent or contiguous angles are such as have one leg common to both angles, both together being equal to two right angles. Thus, in fig. 3, A B C and A B D, or B C C and B E D, are adjacent angles. Exterior or external angles, the angles of any rectilinear figure without it, made by producing the sides; thus, if the sides A B, B C, CA of the triangle ABC (fig. 4) be produced to the point FDE, the angles CBF, ACD, BAE are called exterior angles, in opposition to the angles ABC, BCA, CAB, which are called interior angles. For exterior, interior, and alternate angles, in reference to parallel lines, see EXTENSION, INTERIOR, and ALTERNATE. — Vertical angles. See VERTICAL. — Angles of elevation and inclination. See ELEVATION and INCLINATION. — Angles of depression. See DEPRESSION. — Angles of incidence, reflection, and refraction. See INCIDENCE, REFLECTION, and REFRACTION. — Angle of position, in astron. See POSITION. — Angle of contact, the angle which a circle or other curve makes with a tangent at the point of contact. This term has been discarded from mathematics, and when a curve is supposed to be composed of infinitely small rectilinear elements, the infinitely small acute angle formed by one element with the production of the next answers to the old angle of contact, and is equal to what is called the angle of curvature. — Curvilinear angle, the angle at the meeting of the tangents of two curves. — Angle of direction, in mech. an angle contained by the lines of direction of two co-spiral forces. — Angle of friction, in mech. the angle whose tangent is equal to the coefficient of friction. The coefficient of friction μ of a body resting on an inclined plane is found by observing the angle of friction ϕ (the angle at which the body begins to slide), when μ is equal to ϕ . — Angle of repose, that angle at which one body will just rest upon another without slipping. It varies, of course, with the nature of the bodies in contact, but is constant for the same bodies. It is called by Professor Moseley the limiting angle of resistance. — Angle of sight, in ordnance, the angle between a line drawn through the axis of a bore and a line drawn from the rear of the base-ring to the swell of the muzzle or to the top of the sight. — Facial angle. See FACIAL. — Solid angle, that which is made by more than two plane angles meeting in one point, and not lying in the same plane, as the angle of a cube. — Spherical angle, an angle on the surface of a sphere, contained between the arcs of two great circles which intersect each other. Thus, if AB and BC (fig. 5) be arcs of great circles intersecting one another at the point B, the angle ABC is the spherical angle which they make with one another, and it is equal to the angle of inclination formed by the planes of the great circles AB and BC. — Bowry, or hour angle, the angle made by the arc through the poles and star with the meridian. — Angle capital, (a) in anc. Ionic arch, a capital on the flank column of a portico, having volutes on three sides, the exterior volute being placed at an angle of 135° (or 45°) with the plane of the frieze on front and flank. (b) In modern Ionic arch, the capital of a similarly situated column, having four volutes, each of which is at an angle of 135° (or 45°) with the plane of the frieze. — Angle of divergence, in bot. the angle made by two leaves on the stem, generally expressed as a fraction of the circumference of the stem, which is supposed to be a circle. — Angle (ang'gl), n. [A. Sax. angel, engl, a fish-hook; G. angel, local ongull, a hook; from a root meaning crooked, seen in amohor (which see).] A hook; an apparatus for taking fish, consisting of a rod, a line, and a hook, or of a line and hook.

Fig. 5.

Give me mine angle—we'll to the river. Shak.
I am, sir, a brother of the angle. Is. Walton.
2. One who may be easily enticed; a gull.
At last I sped
An ancient angle coming down the hill. Shak.
Angle (ang'gl), v.t. pret. and pp. angled;
pp. angling. To fish with an angle, or with line and hook. — To angle for, to fish for; to try to gain by some bait or insinuation, as men angle for fish. 'The hearts of all that he did angle for.' Shak.
Angle (ang'gl), v.t. To fish for or catch, as with an angle; to lure or entice, as by a bait. 'He angled the people's hearts.' Sir P. Sidney.
You have angled me on with much pleasure to the church & house. Is. Walton.
Angle (ang'gl), n. One of the people called Angles. See ANGLER.
Angle-bar (ang'gl-bär), n. 1. In corp. a vertical bar at the angles or meetings of the faces of a polygonal or bow window. — 2. A rolled bar of iron for forming the edges of iron safes, bridges, and ships; or to be rivetted to the corners of iron-boilers, tanks, &c. to connect the side plates.

Angle-head (ang'gl-bäd), n. In building, a piece of wood fixed vertically upon the exterior or salient angles of apartments to preserve them, and also to serve as a guide by which to float the plaster. Called also Stag-head.
Angle-brace (ang'gl-bräs), n. In corp. (a) a a, Angle-brace. b, Diagonal brace.

piece of timber fixed at each extremity to one of the two pieces forming the adjacent sides of a system of framing, and subtending the angle formed by their junction. When it is fixed between the opposite angles of a quad-rangular frame it is called a diagonal brace.
They are also called respectively Angle-tie or Diagonal Tie. (b) An instrument consisting of a rectangular crank-frame like the carpenter's brace (see BRACE), but usually much stronger, and carrying a parallel tool-spindle terminating in a pad, or bit-socket of the ordinary form. On this spindle is a small bevel-wheel, which gears into a second wheel on the axis of a winch-handle, by which motion is communicated to the tool. This instrument is chiefly used for boring holes in angular positions, where the ordinary revolving brace cannot be conveniently applied. For heavy work it is usually mounted in the ordinary drill-frame. Called also Corner-drill.

Boring Angle-brace.

Angled (ang'glid), a. Having angles: used chiefly in compounds.
Angle-boat (ang'gl-floit), n. In plastering, a boat made to any internal angle of the planes of both sides of a room.
Angle-iron (ang'gl-i-tern), n. A piece of iron rolled into the shape of the letter L, used for forming the joints of iron plates in girders, boilers,
&c. to which it is riveted.
Anglemeter (ang'gl-mä-tär),
n. [Angle, and Gr. metron, measure.] Any instrument for measuring angles; but more particularly, an instrument used by geologists for measuring the dip of strata.
Angle-plane (ang'gl-plän), n. In corp. a plane whose bit reaches into a re-entering angle.
Angler (ang'glär), n. 1. One that fishes with an angle. — 2. An acanthopterygious fish, family Lophilidae (the Lophius piscatorius), otherwise called the Sea-devil, Fishing-frog, Toad-fish, and Frog-fish, 3 to 5 feet long, very ugly and voracious. See LOPHIUS.
Angle-rafter (ang'gl-raft-är), n. A rafter placed in the line of meeting of the inclined planes forming a hipped roof. Called also Hip and Piend Rafter. See HIP.
Angles (ang'glz), n. pl. [A. Sax. Angle, Angle.] A Low German tribe who in the earliest historical period had their seats in the district about Angeln, in the south-east of the duchy of Sleswig, and who in the fifth century and subsequently crossed over to Britain along with bands of Saxons, Jutes, and Frisians, and colonized a great part of what from them has received the name of England, as well as a portion of the Lowlands of Scotland. The Angles formed the largest body among the Germanic settlers in Britain, and founded the three kingdoms of East Anglia, Mercia, and Northumbria. See ANGLO-SAXON.

Anglesite (ang'gl-sit), n. [From Anglesia, a British locality of the mineral.] A sulphate of lead occurring in prismatic crystals.

Angle-tie (ang'gl-ti), n. Same as Angle-brace (a).

Anglian (ang'gli-an), a. Of or pertaining to the tribe of the Angles.

Anglian (ang'gli-an), n. A member of the tribe of the Angles.

Anglic (ang'gilk), a. Same as Anglican.
[Rare.]

Anglican (ang'gilk-an), a. [L. L. anglicus, from A. Sax. Angle, Angle. See ANGLES.]
English; pertaining to England or the English nation; as, the Anglican Church.
— Anglican Church, a term which strictly embraces only the Church of England and the Protestant Episcopal churches in Ireland, Scotland, and the colonies, but is sometimes made to include also the Episcopal churches of the United States.

Of all the prelates of the Anglican Church, Laud had departed farthest from the principles of the Reformation, and had drawn nearest to Rome.
Macaulay.

Anglican (ang'gilk-an), n. A member of the Church of England. — Catholica, Anglicana, or Calvinista. Burke.

Anglicanism (ang'gilk-an-izm), n. 1. The principles of or adherence to the Established Church of England. — 2. Partiality to England and English institutions.

Anglice (ang'glis-sé), [L.] In English; in the English manner.

Anglicize (ang'glis-i-zé), v.t. To make English; to anglicize. [Rare and obsolete.]

Anglicism (ang'glis-izm), n. 1. The quality of being English.

If Addison's language had been less idiomatical it would have lost something of its genuine Anglicism.
Johnson.

2. An English idiom.

Anglicize (ang'glis-i-zé), v.t. pret. & pp. anglicized; pp. anglicizing. To make English; to render conformable to the English idiom or to English analogies. 'The glaring affectation of anglicizing English words.' T. Watson.

Anglicization (ang'glis-i-kä'zhon), n. The act of converting into English.

Anglity (ang'gl-i-ti), v.t. To convert into English; to anglicize; as, to anglity French words, that is, to give them an English form in orthography, inflection, or pronunciation; to adapt into the English language and make a part of it.

Angling (ang'gling), n. The act or art of fishing with a rod and line; rod-fishing.

We may say of angling as Dr. Boteler said of strawberries: 'Doubtless God could have made a better berry, but doubtless God never did'; and so, if I might be judge, God never did make a more calm, quiet, innocent recreation than angling. Is. Walton.

Anglish (ang'glis), a. and n. Anglo-Saxon;
the Anglo-Saxon or Early English language.
Prof. Haldeman.

Anglo- (ang'glö), prefix. [L. L. Anglus, from Angli. See ANGLES.] A prefix signifying English, or connected with England, frequently used in composition; as, in Anglo-American, Anglo-Indian.

Anglo-American (ang'glö-a-mer-i-kan), a.
Pertaining to the descendants of Englishmen in America.

Anglo-American (ang'glö-a-mer-i-kan), n.
A descendant from English ancestors born in America or the United States.

Anglo-Catholic (ang'glö-kath-ö-lik), n. A member of the English Protestant Church; more specifically, a ritualist; a Puseyite; a High Churchman.

Anglo-Catholic (ang'glö-kath-ö-lik), a. 1. A term employed to designate those churches which adopt the principles of the English Reformation; sometimes restricted to the Anglican or Established Church of England and the allied churches. — 2. A term sometimes applied to that party in the English Church which favours doctrines and the adoption of religious forms closely approaching those of the Roman Catholic Church, and otherwise known as the Ritualistic,
High, or Puseyite section of the Church.

Anglo-Catholicism (ang'glö-ka-thöl'i-sizm), n. 1. The principles or doctrines of the Anglican Church as embodied in the Book of Common Prayer and the Thirty-nine Articles.
2. The principles or doctrines of the Ritualistic or High-Church section of the Anglican Church.

Anglo-Danish (ang'glo-dan'ish), a. Pertaining to the English Danes, or the Danes who settled in England.

Anglo-Indian (ang'glo-in'di-an), a. One of the English race born or resident in the East Indies.

Anglo-Indian (ang'glo-in'di-an), a. Relating to the Anglo-Indians.

Anglo-Irish (ang'glo-ir'ish), n. pl. 1 English people born or resident in Ireland. — 2 Descendants of parents English on the one side and Irish on the other.

Anglo-Irish (ang'glo-ir'ish), a. Pertaining to the Anglo-Irish.

Anglomania (ang'glo-mā'nī-a), n. [Anglo, and Gr. mania, madness.] An excessive or undue attachment to, respect for, or imitation of Englishmen or English institutions and customs by a foreigner.

Anglo-Norman (ang'glo-nor'man), a. Pertaining to the Anglo-Normans.

Anglo-Norman (ang'glo-nor'man), n. An English Norman, one partly Norman partly English. "Charters forged by Anglo-Normans." Wotton.

Anglophobia (ang'glo-fō'bī-a), n. [Anglo, and Gr. phobos, fear.] An excessive hatred to or dread of English people, customs, or institutions.

Anglo-Saxon (ang'glo-sak'son), n. [See ANGLES and SAXON.] 1 One of the nation formed by the union of the Angles, Saxons, and other early Teutonic settlers in Britain, or one of their descendants, a native of England or Lowland Scotland, or one descended from natives of those countries, as an inhabitant of the United States, Canada, Australia, &c.; one belonging to the English race. See extract.

As the Teutons in Britain began to grow together into one people they were sometimes called the Anglo-Saxons—that is the people made up of the Angles and Saxons—but more commonly they were called Angles or English alone. And when so much of Britain as the Teutons lived in came to have a common name that name was Englaland or England, that is the land of the Angles or English. Seen by itself always meant the people of those parts only where the Saxons settled, and the whole people was never so called except by the Celts.

S. A. Freeman.

[Some writers maintain that the proper meaning of Anglo-Saxon is English Saxon, a Saxon of England.] — 2. The earliest form of the English language; the tongue brought to England by the Teutonic invaders, who began to make settlements there about 450 A.D. Anglo-Saxon had two chief dialects, Northern and Southern. After Wessex obtained the supremacy the Southern became the literary language, and had an extensive literature. After the Norman conquest the dialects became more various, and we distinguish three chief varieties—Northern, Midland, and Southern, of which the Midland was the most widely spread, and, gradually taking the lead, became modern English. See ENGLISH.

What is called Anglo-Saxon is really the oldest form of English. The Anglo-Saxon of the first period extends from A.D. 450 to A.D. 1100, that of the later period from A.D. 1100 to about A.D. 1250, after which date we arrive at early Middle English. Skeat.

Anglo-Saxon (ang'glo-sak'son), a. Pertaining to the Anglo-Saxons or early Teutonic settlers in Britain and their descendants; pertaining to the English race.

Anglo-Saxonism (ang'glo-sak'son-izm), n. A characteristic of the Anglo-Saxons; specifically, a word or idiom of the Anglo-Saxon language. Latham.

Angnall (ang'nāl), n. Same as Hangnail.

Angola (an'gō-lā), n. A light and fashionable cloth, well adapted, from its repelling heat, for paleots, cloaks, and overcoats, made from the wool of the Angora-goat. Simmonds.

See ANGORA-WOOL.

Angola-cat (an'gō-lā-kat), n. One of the finest varieties of the domestic cat, distinguished for its size and beautiful long silky hair. It is originally from Angora, in Asia Minor.

Angola-pea (an'gō-lā-pē), n. The Cajanus indicus, so called from Angola, in Western Africa, where it is grown, though not a native of that region. Called also Congo-pea and Pigeon-pea. See CAJANUS.

Angola-wood (an'gō-lā-wed), n. A kind of archil obtained from Angora, in Western Africa, from Roseella tinctoria.

Angor (ang'gor), n. [L.] 1 Pain; intense bodily pain. 2 In med. extreme anxiety, accompanied with painful constriction at the epigastrium, and often with palpitation and oppression. Dunglison.

Angora-goat (an'gō-rā-gōt), n. A variety of goat (Capra angorensis), native to the district surrounding Angora or Engour, in Asia Minor, distinguished for its beautiful silky hair, about 8 inches long. It is called by the Arabs chamal goat, chamal signifying silky or fine, whence the name camel, applied to a fabric manufactured in Angora itself from the yarn made from its wool, and known as Turkey Yarn or Camel Yarn. See ANGORA-WOOL.

Angora-wool (an'gō-rā-whl), n. The long white hair of the Angora-goat, highly prized in manufactures for its silky appearance, which fits it for shawls, laces, braids, and other ornamental fabrics. It is also largely used in the manufacture of Angola cloth, lace, plush, and camlets. Simmonds.

Angostura-bark (ang-gos-tū'rā-bark), n. [From the town of Angostura, in Venezuela, on the river Orinoco.] An excellent bark, possessing aromatic, stimulant, and febrifugal properties, produced by a rutaceous plant, Galipea Cusparia. It was formerly prized as a febrifuge, and is now much used for a kind of bitter. Its use in medicine was discontinued because of the introduction into the markets of a false angostura-bark, obtained from the nux-vomica tree, which produced fatal effects. The Indians steeped fishes with the powdered bark of the Galipea.

Angracum (an-grē'kum), n. [Altered from angurak, the Malay name of such plants.] A remarkable genus of tropical orchids, some of which are leafless, and all generally small-flowered. One species, A. sesquipedale, from Madagascar, has, however, the largest orchideous flower known. The leaves of A. fragrans are used in Bourbon, and to some extent in France, as tea, under the name of saham. Angrily (ang'grī-lī), adv. In an angry manner; poevishly; with indications of resentment.

Rashly and angrily I promised; but cunningly and patiently will I perform. Kingsley.

Angriness (ang'grī-nēs), n. 1 The state of being angry.

Such an angriness of humour that we take fire at everything. Dr. H. More.

2 Inflammation and pain of a sore or swelling. [Obsolescent.]

Angry (ang'grī), a. [See ANGRA.] 1 Feeling resentment, provoked, followed generally by with before a person, and at before a thing.

God is angry with the wicked every day. Ps. vii. 11.

Wherefore should God be angry at thy voice? Ecc. v. 6.

2 Showing anger, wearing the marks of anger; caused by anger, as, an angry countenance; angry words. Hence — 3 Red. "Sweet rose, whose hue angry and brave," G. Herbert. — 4 Raging; furious; tumultuous.

Or chain the angry vengeance of the waves. Judge Trumbull.

5 Sharp in a moral sense; stern; rigorous. [Rare.]

God had provided a severe and angry education to chastise the forwardness of a young spirit. Jer. Taylor.

6 Stimulated, keen; vigorous. [Rare.]

I never ate with angry appetite. Tennyson.

7 In med. inflamed, as a sore, manifesting inflammation.

This serum, being accompanied by the thinner parts of the blood, grows red and angry. Hicman.

ANG Passionate, resentful, irritated, indignant, provoked, hot, raging, furious, tumultuous, wrathful, choleric, inflamed.

Anguifer (an'gwī-fēr), n. [L. anguis, a serpent, and fero, to bear.] In astron. a cluster of stars in the form of a man holding a serpent; Serpentarius, one of the twelve signs of the zodiac.

Anguilla (an'gwī-lā), n. [L. an eel, dim. of anguis, a serpent.] A genus of apodal malacocephalous fishes, family Muraenoidae, the true eels. See EEL.

Anguilliform (an'gwī-lī-form), a. [L. anguilla, an eel, and forma, shape.] Having the form of an eel or of a serpent; resembling an eel or serpent.

Anguine (an'gwīn), a. [L. anguineus, from anguis, a snake.] Pertaining to or resembling a snake, snakelike. "The anguine or snakelike reptiles." Owen. — Anguine lizard, a snake-lizard of South Africa (Chamaesaur anguina). See CHAMAESAURO.

Anguineal (an'gwīn'e-āl), a. [See ANGUINE.] Resembling or pertaining to a snake or snakes.

Anguis (an'gwīs), n. [L.] A genus of reptiles belonging to the family Scincidae. The species are innocent and harmless, but are held in great horror by the vulgar. Their eyes are very small, and in consequence they have been often supposed to be blind. The body is very brittle; the tail is easily broken off, but readily sprouts out afresh, and at the end of a year is quite renewed. A. fragilis (the common blind-worm or slow-worm) is the best known species. See BLIND-WORM.

Anguish (ang'gwish), n. [O.E. angwis, angwisa, angwisa, &c. Fr. angouisse, It. angoscia, sorrow, anguish. L. angustia, a strait, perplexity, from angustus, narrow, root ang as in E. anger (which see).] 1 Extreme pain, either of body or mind.

And they hearkened not unto Moses, for anguish of spirit, and for cruel bondage. Ex. vi. 9.

When pain and anguish bring the brow,
A ministering angel thou. Sir W. Scott.

2 Any keen affection of the emotions or feelings.

He cried in an anguish of delight and gratitude. Thackeray.

— Agony, Anguish. See under AGONY — SYN Distress, pang, throes, agony, torture, torment.

Anguish (ang'gwish), v. t. To distress with extreme pain or grief. "Thine anguished soul." Sp. Hall. "But we not anguished." Wieland.

Anguished (ang'gwish't), pp. and a. Affected by anguish; expressing or caused by anguish.

On thy cold forehead starts the anguished dew. Coleridge.

Angular (ang'gū-lēr), a. [L. angularis, from angulus, an angle.] 1 Having an angle or angles; having corners; pointed; as, an angular figure; an angular piece of rock. — 2 Consisting of an angle; forming an angle; as, an angular point. — Angular artery and vein, in anat. (a) the termination of the facial artery and vein, because they pass by the greater angle of the eye; (b) the facial artery and vein themselves, because they pass under the angle of the jaw. Dunglison. — Angular capital. Same as Angle Capital (which see under ANGLE). — Angular intervals, in astron. those arcs of the equator which are intercepted between circles of declination passing through the objects observed. They are measured by means of the transit instrument and clock. — Angular motion, in physics, the motion of any body which moves circularly about a fixed or relatively fixed point; as, the angular motion of a pendulum or a planet; so called because such motion is measured by the angle contained between the lines drawn from the fixed point to the successive positions of the moving body. — Angular perspective, in painting, that kind of perspective in which neither of the sides of the principal object is parallel to the plane of the picture; and, therefore, in the representation, the horizontal lines of both converge to vanishing points: called also Oblique Perspective. — Angular processes, in anat. the orbital processes of the frontal bone near the angles of the eye. — Angular sections, that part of mathematics which treats of the division of angles into equal parts. — Angular velocity, in physics, the rate at which a body revolves round a fixed axis; that is, the rate at which a line continually drawn from the one body to the other shifts its position in space.

Angularity (ang'gū-lār'tī), n. The quality of being angular.

A minute animal, especially one that is microscopic or invisible to the naked eye. Animalcules exist abundantly in rivers and ponds, and in all animal and vegetable infusions.

Animalculist (an-i-mal'kū-lis't), n. One versed in the knowledge of animalcules.

Animalculum (an-i-mal'kū-lum), n. pl. Animalcula (an-i-mal'kū-lā). An animalcule.

Animal-flower (an-i-mal-flou'ér), n. A name sometimes given to the sea-anemones or other animal productions having some resemblance to flowers.

Animalish (an-i-mal-ish), a. Of or pertaining to or like an animal, especially an irrational animal; brutish. [Rare.]

The world hath no blood nor brains, nor any animalish or humane form. Cudworth.

Animalism (an-i-mal-izm), n. 1. The state of a mere animal; the state of being actuated by sensual appetites only, and not by intellectual or moral qualities; sensuality. — 2. An animal; specifically, a human being possessing mere animal appetites and passions. [Rare.]

Girls, Hetairai, curious in their art,
Hired animalisms, vile as those that made
The mulberry-faced dictator's orgies worse Than aught they fable of the quiet gods. Tracy.

3. In physiol. a theory which holds that the embryo is entirely formed from the spermatic communication of the male.

Animality (an-i-mal-i-ti), n. The state of being an animal; animal existence or nature; specifically, in physiol. the aggregate of those vital phenomena which, superadded to vegetality, constitute animal existence. See VEGETALITY.

Animalization (an-i-mal-i-zā'shon), n. The act of animalizing; as, (a) the act of giving animal life, or endowing with the properties of an animal. (b) Conversion into animal matter by the process of assimilation. 'The alimentary canal, in which the conversion and animalization of the food takes place.' Owen.

Animalize (an-i-mal-iz), v.t. pret. & pp. animalized; ppr. animalizing. 1. To give animal life to; to endow with the attributes of an animal. Warburton. — 2. To convert into animal matter. — 3. To cause to be actuated chiefly by the animal part of man's nature; to reduce to the level of an irrational animal; to bring under the sway of animal appetites. Coleridge. — To animalize vegetable fibre, to confer upon vegetable fibre the physical characteristics of animal fibre, as by treating cotton with a strong solution of caustic soda, when the fibre shrinks, becomes stronger, and has an increased capacity for receiving colouring matter.

Animalness (an-i-mal-nes), n. The state of being an animal; animality.

Animant (an-i-mant), a. Possessing or conferring the properties of life and soul; quickening. Cudworth. [Rare.]

Animastic (an-i-mas'tik), n. The doctrine of the soul; psychology.

The other schoolmen . . . carefully explained that these operations were not in their own nature proposed to the logician; for, as such, they belonged to animastic, as they called it, or psychology. Sir W. Hamilton.

Animate (an-i-māt), v.t. pret. & pp. animated; ppr. animating. [L. animatus, animated, pp. of animare, to fill with breath. See ANIMAL.] 1. To give natural life to; to quicken; to make alive; as, the soul animates the body. — 2. To inspire or inform, as if with life; to give life or liveliness to; to heighten the powers or effect of.

But none, ah, none can animate the lyre,
And the mute strings with vocal souls inspire. Dryden.

3. To give spirit or vigour to; to infuse courage, joy, or other enlivening passion into; to stimulate or incite; as, to animate dispirited troops.

The more to animate the people, he stood on high, from whence he might be best heard, and cried unto them with a loud voice. Knollys.

Animate (an-i-māt), a. Alive; possessing animal life. 'Creatures animate.' Milton.

Every acre of soil was animate, so to speak, with duties and privileges, which had attached to it from time immemorial, and could not be lost. C. H. Pearson.

Animated (an-i-māt-ed), p. and a. 1. Being endowed with animal life; as, the various classes of animated beings. — 2. Lively; vigorous; full of spirit; indicating animation; as, an animated discourse.

On the report there was an animated debate. Macaulay.

3. In the fine arts, applied to a painting or statue which is executed with such vigour and truth that it appears full of life. Fairholt.

Can storied urn or animated bust
Back to its mansion call the fleeting breath? Gray.

Animateness (an-i-māt-nes), n. The state of being animate or animated.

Animater (an-i-māt-ér), n. One who animates or gives life.

Animating (an-i-māt-ing), p. and a. Giving life; infusing spirit; enlivening; rousing. 'Animating strains.' Worcester.

Animatingly (an-i-māt-ing-lī), adv. So as to animate or excite feeling.

Animation (an-i-mā'shon), n. The act of animating or state of being animated: (a) the act of infusing animal life, or the state of being animated or having life infused. (b) Liveliness; briskness; the state of being full of spirit and vigour; as, he recited the story with great animation. (c) In the fine arts, the character of a figure or group designed with such energy and vigour as to suggest the idea of life and motion. — SYN. Life, vivacity, spirit, buoyancy, sprightliness, liveliness.

Animative (an-i-māt-iv), a. Having the power of giving life or spirit.

Animator (an-i-māt-ér), n. One who or that which animates or gives life or anything analogous to life. Sir T. Browne.

Anime (an-i-me), n. [Fr.] In her. of a different tincture from the animal itself: said of the eyes of a rapacious animal.

Anime (an-i-me), n. [Sp.] 1. A resin exuding from the stem of a large American tree of the genus Hymenaea (H. Courbaril), called in the West Indies locust-trees. It is of a transparent amber colour, with a slight agreeable smell, and has little or no taste. It dissolves entirely, but not readily, in rectified spirit of wine, and burns with a very fragrant smell, and is therefore used in scenting pastilles. It produces one of the finest varnishes. — 2. Indian copal produced by Valeria indica. See VATERIA.

Animetta (an-i-met'tā), n. [Dim. of L. anima.] Eccles, the cloth which covers the cup of the eucharist.

Animism (an-i-mizm), n. [L. anima, the soul.] 1. The hypothesis of Pythagoras and Plato of a force (Anima mundi, or soul of the world) immaterial but inseparable from matter, and giving to matter its form and movements. — 2. The system of medicine, propounded by Stahl, in which the rational soul is regarded as the principle of life, the body being a matter incapable of self-movement, and not only originally formed by the soul, but also set in motion by the working of its elastic power. Hence it was inferred that the source of disease must be looked for in the soul, and medical treatment should be confined to an attempt to remove the obstacles which have arisen to the free and full working of the soul. — 3. The general doctrine of souls and other spiritual beings. A philosophy explaining all the phenomena in nature not due to obvious natural causes by attributing them to spiritual agency, seems to have been developed everywhere among the communities of mankind in the earliest stages of their existence. Amongst the beliefs most characteristic of this philosophy is that of a human apparitional soul, that is, of a vital and animating principle residing in the body but distinct from it, bearing its form and appearance, but wanting its material and solid substance.

Animist (an-i-mist), n. One who maintains animism in any of its various senses.

Animistic (an-i-mist'ik), a. Of or pertaining to, embracing or founded on, animism; as, animistic philosophy.

Animose (an-i-mōs), a. [L. animosus, full of courage, ardent, from animus, the mind, courage, pride.] Full of spirit; hot; vehement; resolute. Ash.

Animosity (an-i-mōs'i-ti), n. [L. animositas, from animosus. See ANIMOSE.] 1. Animation; courage; spiritedness.

Cato, before he durst give the fatal stroke, spent part of the night in reading the Immortality of Plato, thereby confirming his wavering hand unto the animosity of that attempt. Sir T. Browne.

2. Violent hatred, accompanied with active opposition; active enmity.

The animosity produced by difference of race was increased by difference of religion, . . . when Scotland had set the example of successful resistance, when England was distracted by internal quarrels, the smothered rage of the Irish broke forth into acts of fearful violence. Macaulay.

— Animosity, Enmity, Malice. Animosity differs from enmity in that it is accompanied by passion, and is generally avowed and active; while enmity may be secret and inactive, though more deep-seated and inveterate. It is a less criminal passion than malice. One who harbours animosity seeks to gain a cause or destroy an enemy or rival, from hatred or private interest; a person actuated by malice seeks to do injury to another merely for the sake of giving pain.

Animus (an-i-mus), n. [L., the mind.] Intention; purpose; spirit; temper; especially, hostile spirit or angry temper; as, the animus with which a book is written.

Anion (an-i-on), n. [Gr. ana, upward, and ion, going. Lit. that which goes up.] In elect. a term applied by Faraday to the element of an electrolyte, which in electrochemical decompositions appears at the positive pole or anode, and is usually termed the electro-negative ingredient of a compound, as oxygen, chlorine, and an acid. See ANODE, CATION.

Anise (an'is), n. [Fr. and Pr. anis, from L. anisum, Gr. anison.] An annual plant of the genus Pimpinella (P. anisum), nat. order Umbelliferae. It grows naturally in Egypt, and is cultivated in Spain and Malta, whence the seed, or rather the fruit, is imported. The flowers are small and white; the fruit or 'seed' is ovate with ten narrow ribs, between which are oil-vessels. Anise seed has an aromatic smell and a pleasant warm taste; it is largely employed in the manufacture of liqueurs. When distilled with water it yields a volatile syrupy oil having an aromatic smell, which separates when cooled into two portions, a light oil and a solid camphor. Star or Chinese anise is Illicium anisatum. See ILLICIUM.

Anised (an'i-séd), n. 1. The seed of the anise. — 2. A cordial or liqueur prepared from it. See ANISE.

Anisette (an-i-sét), n. [Fr.] A liqueur flavoured with anise; aniseed.

Anisic (a-nis'ik), a. Of or pertaining to anise. — Anisic acid ($C_6H_5O_2$), an acid obtained from aniseed by the action of oxidizing substances. It is crystallizable and volatile, and forms salts which crystallize readily.

Anisodactylia (an-i-sō-dak'tī-lā), n. pl. [Gr. an for a, not, isos, equal, and dactylis, a finger, toe.] One of the four sections into which the pachydermatous or thick-skinned animals have been subdivided with reference to the conformation of their feet or paddles. The Anisodactylia are characterized by having several hoofs, forming a single series round the bottom of the foot. This section comprehends the bulkier terrestrial animals, as the mammoth, mastodon, elephant, rhinoceros, hippopotamus, tapir, &c.

Anisodactyle (an-i-sō-dak'tīl), n. 1. One of an order of birds in the classification of Temminck, including those insectivorous species the toes of which are of unequal length, as in the nut-hatch. — 2. One of the Anisodactylia.

Anisodynamous (an-i-sō-din'am-us), a. [Gr. anisos, unequal, and dynamis, power.] In bot. a name given to monocotyledonous plants, because having only one cotyledon, they grow at first with more force on one side of their axis than on the other.

Anisomerle (an-i-sō-mer'ik), a. [Gr. anisos, unequal, and meros, a part.] Not consisting of symmetrical or corresponding parts; unsymmetrical. Dana.

Anisostemonous (an-i-sō-stem'on-us), a. [Gr. anisos, unequal, and stemon, the warp of a web.] In bot. a term applied to plants in which the number of the stamens does not correspond with the number of the petals or the sepals; as, for instance, when a flower having five sepals has three or seven stamens.

Antrogenous (a-ni-tro'jen-us), a. Not containing or supplying nitrogen; non-nitrogenous.

Anjoola (an-jō'la), n. A sort of floating-house, supported upon two large canoes, connected with planks, and used by the Singalese both for a habitation and as a means of transporting pottery, wood, oil, &c.

Anker (ang'kér), n. [D.] A Dutch Heald measure, formerly used in England, containing 10 wine gallons.

Anker, n. An anchorite or hermit. Chaucer.

Fâte, fâr, fat, fâll; mē, met, hér; pine, piu; nôte, not, môve; tûbe, tub, bull; oil, pound; ù, Sc. abuse; y, Sc. leg.

Ankerite (ang-kér-ít), n. [After Prof. Anker of Graz.] A crystallized variety of dolomite containing much iron. It consists of carbonates of lime, iron, magnesia, and manganese, and is much prized as an ore of iron for smelting and a flux. It occurs near Torosene in the Orkneya, in amygdaloid.

Ankle (ang'kí), n. [A. Sax. ancleas, oneleas, O. Fris. ankel, ankel, D. enklave, enkel, Dan. and Sw. ankel, Icel. ánkla, G. ankel, O.H.G. ankel. Probably from a root ank, meaning crooked. See ANCHOR.] The joint which connects the foot with the leg.

Ankle-bone (ang'kí-bón), n. The bone of the ankle.

Ankled (ang'kíd), a. Having ankles; used in composition; as, well-ankled.

Anklet (ang'kíet), n. 1. A little ankle. — 2. An ornament, as a ring of metal, for the ankle. — 3. A framework for the leg, intended to stiffen the ankle-joint and prevent the ankle turning sideways in skating. — 4. An article of dress, which forms an extension above the top of the boot or the shoe, and is in some cases a protection for a weak ankle, in others merely an ornamental extension.

Ankylosis (ang'kí-lóis), v.t. [See ANKYLOSIS.] To fix immovably, as a joint; to stiffen. Osseus.

Ankylosed (ang'kí-lóset), p. and a. Immovably fixed or stiffened, as the movable bones of joints, by disease; affected with or consolidated by ankylosis.

Ankylosis (ang'kí-ló'sis), a. [Gr., a stiffening of the joints, from ankylos, crooked, ankylós, a bend, a joint, the elbow.] Stiffness and immovability of a joint; morbid adhesion of the articular ends of contiguous bones. This is sometimes caused by a want of the oily fluid, termed synovial fluid, secreted at the joints. Improperly written Ankylosis.

Ankylotic (ang'kí-ló'tík), a. Pertaining to ankylosis.

Anlage. See ANELAGE.

Anlaut (an'lout), n. [G. prefix an, marking an approach or beginning, and laut, sound.] In philo the initial sound of a word.

Ann, Annat (an, an'nát), n. [See ANNATS.] In Scots law, the portion of stipend payable for the half-year after the death of a clergyman of the Church of Scotland, to which his family or nearest of kin have right.

Anna (an'na), n. In the East Indies, the sixteenth part of a rupee, or about 1½d. sterling.

Annal (an'nál), n. [L. annalis, pertaining to a year, from annus, a year.] 1. A register or record of the events of a year; chiefly used in the plural. 'A last year's annal.' Webster. See ANNALS. — 2. In the R. Cath. Ch. a mass said for any person every day in the year; or a mass said on a particular day every year.

Annalist (an'nál-íst), n. A writer of annals.

The annals . . . were the only annalists in those ages. Hume.

Annalistic (an-nál-íst'ík), a. Pertaining or peculiar to an annalist. 'Written in a stiff annalistic method.' Sir G. C. Lewis.

Ant't (an't), a contraction of an t, that is, if it. See AN.

Ant' (ant), n. Same as Ant't.

Ant (ant), n. [From A. Sax. arneta, an emmet (like ant, from L. arnita). See EMMET.] An emmet; a pismire; a hymenopterous insect of the family Formicidae and genus Formica. Ants live in communities, and the internal economy of their nest or hillock presents an extraordinary example of the results of combined industry. Each community consists of males with four wings; of females much larger than the males, and possessing wings only during the pairing season; and of barren females, otherwise called neuters, workers, or nurses, destitute of wings. The females lay their eggs in parcels of six or more. The males and females desert the nest soon after becoming perfect. The male, like the drone-bee, becomes useless after impregnating the female. The grubs spin a cocoon, and become pupae, which resemble barley-corns, and are popularly taken for eggs. Under the names of ants brood, ants eggs, they are an article of import in some northern countries for making formic acid; dissolved in water, they are used for vinegar in Norway. The young grubs are fed by the females and by the nurses, who are also the formers of the streets and galleries, &c., of the colony, and the performers generally of the work of the community. There are many species of ants, from the operations they perform called mining-ants, carpenters, masons, &c. The favourite food of ants is honey, particularly honey-dew excreted by aphides; but they also live on fruits, insects and their larvae, and on dead birds and mammals. They are torpid in winter. Ants are bolder than any animal of the same size. Those of the same or different species have pitched battles, and capture slaves or take larvae from other nests. Some species have stings, others squirt out an irritant fluid (formic acid). There are a dozen British species, the largest being the Formica rufa, the red or horse ant, $\frac{1}{2}$ inch long, which raises hills nearly as large as a small hay-cock. The name ant is also given to insects of the neuropterous genus Termites. See TERMITES.

Antelope (an-té-lóp), n. [Origin doubtful. Some derive it from a Gr. antelope, an antelope, supposed to be compounded of antheos, a flower, and ops, an eye.] A name applied to many species of ruminant mammals closely resembling the deer in general appearance, but essentially different in nature from them. The antelopes are included with the sheep and oxen in the section Caviornia or 'hollow-horned' ruminants. Their horns, unlike those of the deer, are not deciduous, but are permanent, each consisting essentially of a process of the frontal bone—the cors of the horn—covered by a sheath of horny material. Their horns are never branched as those of the deer usually are; they are, however, often twisted spirally, and may be borne by both sexes. They are found in greatest number and variety in Africa, from which continent deer, with one or two exceptions, are entirely absent. Among the antelopes we may mention the chamol, the saiga (the only two European species), the gazelle, the addax, the eland, the koodoo, the gnu, the assin or Indian antelope, and the prong-buck of America. By some naturalists they are formed into a family (Antilopidae) or sub-family (Antilopina) divided into genera, by others almost the whole of them are included in the genus Antelope.

a. Anther.

Anthophyllite (an-tho'fil-lit), n. [L. anthophyllum, a clove, from Gr. anthos, a flower, and phyllon, a leaf. From its colour.] A clove-brown variety of hornblende, occurring in radiating columnar aggregates; tremolite.

Anthophyllitic (an-tho'fil-lit'ik), a. Pertaining to anthophyllite, or containing it.
Anthorism, Anthorismus (an-thor-izm, an-tho-riz-mus), n. [Gr. anthorismos—anti, opposite, and horismos, a marking out, a definition, from horos, a boundary.] In rhet. a description or definition contrary to that which is given by the adverse party.

Anthosiderite (an-tho-sid'er-it), n. [Gr. anthos, a flower, and sideritis, of iron.] A native silicate of iron, of an ochreous-yellow colour inclining to yellowish-brown, having a fibrous radiated structure, and found at Antonio Pereira, in Minas Geraes, Brazil.

Anthotaxis (an-tho-tak'sis), n. [Gr. anthos, a flower, and taxis, order.] In bot. the arrangement of flowers on the axis of growth. Called also Inflorescence.

Anthoxanthin, Anthoxanthins (an-tho-an'thin), n. [Gr. anthos, a flower, and xanthos, yellow.] The yellow colouring matter of plants; xanthin (which see).

Anthoxanthum (an-tho-zan'thum), n. [Gr. anthos, a flower, and xanthos, yellow.] A genus of grasses, the flowers of which have only two stamens. A. odoratum is well known to farmers under the name of sweet vernal-grass or spring-grass. The peculiar colour of new hay is chiefly due to its presence. See SPRING-GRASS.

Anthosmia (an-tho-si'a), n. [Gr. anthos, a flower, and smia, to live.] In bot. the process of the leaves of a plant assuming the appearance of petals.

Anthosom (an-tho-so'm), n. pl. [Gr. anthos, a flower, and zōon, a living creature.] A term formerly used to embrace such flower-like animals as are now generally classed among the Actinozoa (which see).

Anthosoma (an-tho-so'ma), a. Pertaining to the Anthosoma.

Anthrosene (an-thra-sen), n. [See ANTHRACITE.] Paraphthaline (which see). See also ALIBERINE.

Anthraethosurus (an-thra-eth'ur-sus), a. [Gr. anthra, anthracos, coal, and l. ferro, to bear.] Yielding anthracite: applied to geological strata.

Anthracin (an-thra-sin), n. Same as Anthracene.

Anthracite (an-thra-sit), n. [Gr. anthraz, anthracos, a burning coal.] Glance or blind coal, a non-bituminous coal of a shining lustre, approaching to metallic, and which burns without smoke, with a weak or no flame, and with intense heat. It consists of, on an average, 90 per cent. carbon, 3 hydrogen, and 5 azote. There are several varieties known as canonies, slaty, and columnar. It has some of the properties of coke or charcoal, and, like that substance, represents an extreme metamorphism of coal under the influence of heat or of volcanic disturbance. It is found in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and in large quantities in the United States.

Anthracitic (an-thra-sit'ik), a. Pertaining to anthracite.

Anthracolite (an-thrak'o-lit), n. Same as Anthracite.

Anthracometer (an'thrak-om'et'er), n. [Gr. anthraz, anthracos, carbon, and metron, a measure.] An instrument for ascertaining the quantity of carbonic acid gas present in any case.

Anthracomite (an-thrak'on-it), n. [Gr. anthraz, anthracos, coal.] A variety of marble of a coal-black lustre, occurring at Kilkenny. The blackness is due to the presence of bitumen. It gives off a fetid sulphureo-bituminous odour when heated, and is hence known under the popular name of Stinkstone.

Anthracosaurus (an-thrak'ō-s'rus), n. [Gr. anthraz, anthracos, coal, and saurus, a lizard.] A labyrinthodont animal, first found in the carboniferous strata of the west of Scotland. The head measured 18 inches in length.

Anthracothere (an-thrak'o-thēr), n. Same as Anthracotherium.

Anthracotherium (an'thra-ko-thē'ri-um), n. [Gr. anthraz, anthracos, a coal, and therion, a beast.] An extinct pachydermatous mammal, somewhat resembling a hog, allied to the palmætheria, so named because it was at first only found in the miocene lignite or anthracite of Tuscany. It is now found in other deposits.

Anthrax (an'thraks), n. [Gr.] 1. In med. a carbuncle; a malignant ulcer, with intense burning sensation.—2. An ancient name for a certain gem; carbuncle, ruby, or garnet. 3. Lithanthrax, or pit or stone coal.

Anthrenus (an'thrē-nus), n. [Gr. anthrēnē, a hornet.] A genus of coleopterous insects, family Dermestidae, whose larvae, especially that of A. or Dermestes mucronatus, are the pests of our museums, on account of their ravages on specimens of dried animals.

Anthriscus (an-thris'kus), n. [L., the name of a plant described by Pliny resembling Scandix.] A genus of plants, nat. order Umbelliferae, with thin, finely-divided leaves and small white flowers. There are two British species, besides a third (A. cerefolium), now found wild, but originating in an escape from our gardens, well known as a salad and pot herb under the name of garden chervil.

Anthropic (an-throp'ik), a. [Gr. anthrōpos, a man.] Belonging to man; man-like; sprung from man.

The Greeks in their great age are assumed to have been a purely Aryan people, speaking a language closely allied to Sanskrit; yet their religion is not that of the Vedas or the Zend Avesta. . . . Their gods are anthropic, and belong to an ancestral worshiping people. Quart. Rev.

Anthropidae (an-throp'idē), n. pl. [Gr. anthrōpos, a man.] Huxley's name for the highest group of mammals, of which man is the only genus and species; the Bimana.

Anthropoglot (an-throp'ō-glōt), n. [Gr. anthrōpos, a man, and glōtta, the tongue.] An animal which has a tongue resembling that of man, as the parrot.

Anthropography (an-thrō-pog'ra-fi), n. [Gr. anthrōpos, a man, and graphē, a description.] A description of man or of the human race; more particularly, that branch of physical geography which treats of the actual distribution of the human race, as distinguished by physical character, language, institutions, and customs. See ETHNOGRAPHY.

Anthropoid (an-thrō-poid), a. [Gr. anthrōpos, a man, and eidos, resemblance.] Resembling man; specifically applied to such apes as most closely approach the human race, as the gorilla and chimpanzee.

The gorilla is now generally regarded as the most human of the anthropoid apes. H. A. Nicholson.

Anthropoides (an-thrō-pō'idēs), n. A genus of grallatorial birds, family Gruidæ, including the demouille, the Stanley, and crowned cranes.

Anthropolatry (an-thrō-pol'a-tri), n. [Gr. anthrōpos, a man, and latreia, service, worship.] Lit. the worship of man—a charge brought by the early Christians against the ancient heathens, and retorted by the latter on the Christians, on account of their worship of Christ. The word, however, is better known from its employment by the Apollinarians against the orthodox Christians of the fourth and fifth centuries, who held the doctrine of the perfect human nature of Christ.

Anthropolite (an-thrō-pō-lit), n. [Gr. anthrōpos, a man, and lithos, a stone.] A petrification of the human body or skeleton, or of parts of the body, by the incrusting action of calcareous waters, and hence hardly to be considered fossil or sub-fossil.

Anthropologic, Anthropological (an-thrō-pō-loj'ik, an-thrō-pō-loj'ik-al), a. 1. Pertaining to anthropology.—2. According to human manner of speaking. 'Anthropologic wisdom.' Kingley.

Anthropologist (an-thrō-pō-loj'ist), n. One who writes on or studies anthropology.

Anthropology (an-thrō-pō-loj-i), n. [Gr. anthrōpos, a man, and logos, discourse.] 1. A discourse upon human nature. [Rare.]—2. That manner of expression by which the inspired writers attribute human parts and passions to God. [Rare.]—3. The science of man and mankind, including the study of man's place in nature, that is, of the measure of his agreement with and divergence from other animals; of his physical structure and psychological nature, together with the extent to which these act and react on each other; of the various tribes of men, determining how these may have been produced or modified by external conditions, and consequently taking account also of the advance or retrogression of the human race. Anthropology is thus much more extensive in its scope than ethnology, which concerns itself only with the last of these branches. It puts under contribution all sciences which have man for their object, as archeology, comparative anatomy, physiology, psychology, climatology, &c. By some anthropology has been divided as follows:—(a) Zoological anthropology, which investigates man's relations to the brute creation; (b) Descriptive anthropology or ethnology, describing the divisions and groups of mankind; (c) General anthropology, or, as M. Broca calls it, the 'biology of the human race.' This last is anthropology proper.

Anthropomancy (an-thrō-pō-man-si), n. [Gr. anthrōpos, a man, and manēia, divination.] Divination by inspecting the entrails of a human being.

Anthropometry (an-thrō-pō-mē't-rī), n. [Gr. anthrōpos, a man, and metron, measure.] The measurement of the human body.

Anthropomorphic (an-thrō-pō-mor'fik), a. 1. Relating to or characterized by anthropomorphism; as, anthropomorphic conceptions of Deity.—2. Resembling man; approaching man in type; anthropoid; as, anthropomorphic apes.

Anthropomorphism (an-thrō-pō-mor'fizm), n. [Gr. anthrōpos, a man, and morphē, form.] 1. The representation or conception of the Deity under a human form, or with human attributes and affections. Anthropomorphism is founded in the natural inaptitude of the human mind for conceiving spiritual things except through sensuous images, and in its consequent tendency to accept such expressions as those of Scripture when it speaks of the eye, the ear, and the hand of God, of his seeing and hearing, of his remembering and forgetting, of his making man in his own image, &c., in a too literal sense.

Although Milton was undoubtedly a high Arian in his mature life, he does, in the necessity of poetry, give a greater objectivity to the Father and the Son than he would have justified in argument. He was wise in adopting the strong anthropomorphism of the Hebrew Scriptures at once. Coleridge.

2. The doctrine which attributes to animals mental faculties of the same nature as those of man, though much lower in degree; strictly called biological anthropomorphism, to distinguish it from anthropomorphism proper, or theological anthropomorphism. See EXTRACT.

Descartes . . . deserted the old moderate view which affirmed that between the highest psychical powers of man and brutes there is a certain natural likeness and analogy, and gave rise to the notion that animals are nothing but wonderfully complex machines—an error naturally resulting in the opposite one now so prevalent—the error, namely, that there is a substantial identity between the brute soul and the soul of man—biological anthropomorphism. St. George Mivart.

Anthropomorphist (an-thrō-pō-mor'fist), n. An anthropomorphite (which see).

Anthropomorphite (an-thrō-pō-mor'fit), n. One who believes that the Supreme Being exists in human form with human attributes and passions; specifically applied to one of a sect of ancient heretics who held such views.

Though few profess themselves anthropomorphites, yet we may find many among the ignorant of that opinion. Lodge.

Anthropomorphite (an-thrō-pō-mor'fit), a. Relating to anthropomorphism.

Anthropomorphitic, Anthropomorphical (an-thrō-pō-mor'it'ik, an-thrō-pō-mor'it'ik-al), a. Pertaining to anthropomorphism.

Anthropomorphitism (an-thrō-pō-mor'it-izm), n. The doctrines of anthropomorphites.

Anthropomorphous (an-thrō-pō-mor'fus), a. Having the figure of or resemblance to a man; as, an anthropomorphous plant.

Anthropopathical (an-thrō-pō-path'ik-al), a. Subject to human passions.

Anthropopathically (an-thrō-pō-path'ik-al-i), adv. In an anthropopathical manner.

Anthropopathism, Anthropopathy (an-thrō-pō-path-izm, an-thrō-pō-path-i), n. [Gr. anthrōpos, a man, and pathos, passion.] 1. The affections or passions of man; sensibility of man.—2. The ascription of human passions to the Supreme Being.

In its recoil from the gross anthropopathy of the vulgar notions, it falls into the vacuum of absolute apathy. Harr.

Anthropophagi (an-thrō-pō-fa'i), n. pl. [Gr. anthrōpos, a man, and phagō, to eat.] Man-eaters; cannibals; men that eat human flesh.

The cannibals that each other eat. The anthropophagi. Shaks.

Anthropophagical (an-thrō-pō-fa'i'ik-al), a. Relating to cannibalism.

Anthrophaginian (an-thrô'pô-fa-jîn'i-an), n. A cannibal; one who eats human flesh. [Ludicrous.]

He'll speak like an anthrophaginian unto thee. Shak.

Anthrophagite (an-thrô-pô-fa-jit), n. A cannibal.

Anthrophagous (an-thrô-pô-fa-gus), a. Feeding on human flesh.

Anthrophagy (an-thrô-pô-fa-jî), n. The eating of human flesh, or the practice of eating it. 'The anthrophagy of Diomedes his horse.' Sir T. Brown.

Anthroposcopy (an-thrô-pos'kô-pî), n. [Gr. anthrôpos, a man, and skopos, to view.] The art of discovering or judging of a man's character, passions, and inclinations from the lineaments of his body.

Anthroposophy (an-thrô-posô'fî), n. [Gr. anthrôpos, a man, and sophia, wisdom.] Knowledge of the nature of man; acquaintance with man's structure and functions, comprehending anatomy and physiology.

Anthropotomical (an-thrô-pô-tôm'ik-al), a. Pertaining to anthropotomy, or the dissection of the human body.

Anthropotomist (an-thrô-pô-tôm'ist), n. An anatomist of the human body. Owen.

Anthrotomy (an-thrô-pô-tô-mî), n. [Gr. anthrôpos, a man, and tomê, a cutting.] The anatomy or dissection of the human body; human anatomy.

The os innominatum is represented throughout life in most reptiles by three distinct bones, answering to the iliac, ischial, and pubic portions in anthrotomy. Owen.

Anthurium (an-thû'ri-um), n. [Gr. anthos, a flower, and oura, a tail.] A genus of South American plants, nat. order Araceæ, growing epiphytically on forest trees. The flowers are arranged on a fleshy spike, rising out of a green or coloured spathe. They are extensively cultivated as ornamental plants in our greenhouses.

Anthus (an'thus), n. [L. a hunting.] A genus of insectorial birds, allied to the genus Alauda (the larks); the pipits or tit-larks. There are four species found in the British Islands, the Anthus Richardsi (or Richard's pipit), A. pratensis (the meadow pipit or moss-cheeper), A. arvensis (the tree-pipit), and A. aquaticus (the shore-pipit). The meadow-pipit or titling is the species to whose fostering care the young cuckoo is most generally consigned. See PIPIT.

Anthyllis (an-thîl'is), n. [The Greek name of an unascertained plant.] A genus of leguminous plants, to which the kidney-vetch or lady's-fingers (A. vulneraria) belongs. It is found in dry soils, and was formerly famous for stanching the blood of wounds. See KIDNEY-VETCH.

Anthyptic (ant-hîp-not'ik), a. [Corrupt orthography.] See ANTHYPNOTIC.

Anthyphondriac (ant-hîpô-kon'dri-ak), See ANTHYPHONDRIAC.

Anthyphora (ant-hî-pôf'ô-ra), See ANTHYPHORA.

Anthysteric (ant-hîs-tê'rik), See ANTHYSTERIC.

Anti- (an'tî) [See ANTE.] A Greek preposition prefixed to many words, almost exclusively of Greek origin, and signifying over against, opposite, adverse, hostile, in place of, equal to, like, in response to, as antichristian, antichristian, antigraph, antiphony.

Antibrachial (an-tî-brâ'ki-al), a. [L. antibrachium for antibrachium, the forearm—ante, before, and brachium, the arm.] Pertaining to the forearm. More properly written Antebrachial.

Antiburgher (an-tî-bêrg'êr), n. [Gr. anti, opposed to, and E. Burgher, a seceder who approved of the burgher oath.] A member of one of the two sections into which the Scotch Secession Church was split in 1747, by a controversy on the lawfulness of accepting a clause in the oath required to be taken by burghers declaratory of 'their profession and allowance of the true religion professed within the realm and authorized by the laws thereof.' The Antiburghers denied that this oath could be taken consistently with the principles of the church, while the Burghers affirmed its compatibility. The result was that the church was rent in two, each section establishing a communion of its own. They coalesced in 1820 into the United Associate Synod.

Antic (an'tik), a. [A form of antique, L. antiquus, ancient. The modern sense of this word is derived from the grotesque figures seen in the antique sculpture of the middle ages. See ANTIQUE.] 1. † Old. 'Lords of antic fame.' Phaer.—2. Odd; fanciful; grotesque; fantastic; as, antic tricks. 'The antic postures of a merry-andrew.' Addison. Specifically—3. In painting and sculpt. Irregular in combination or fancy; of heterogeneous character, as the fantastical combination of the human form with those of foliage, birds, beasts, &c., so as to form a composite or interblended figure, wherein the one form passes into and becomes merged in the other. Fairholt.

Antic (an'tik), n. 1. † A buffoon or merry-andrew; one that practises odd gesticulations.

Fear not, my lord, we can contain ourselves, Were he the veriest antic in the world. Shak.

Sb. from L. stibium, see p. 97; at wt. 120.2. A brittle metal of a bluish white or silvery-white colour and plated or scaly texture occurring in two forms, crystalline and amorphous, sometimes found native or alloyed with other metals. The crystallized trioxide (Sb₂O₃) is a native mineral called stibite or antimony-glance. (See STIBITE.) The metal, or as it was formerly called, the regulus of antimony, is not liable to rust or tarnish when exposed to the air, and this property, combined with its own hardness and that of its compounds, renders it of great service in the useful arts in the construction of alloys, as Britannia metal, type metal, and pewter. In bells it renders the sound more clear; it renders tin more hard, white, and soocerous, and given to printing types more firmness and smoothness. It is also useful in promoting the fusion of metals, and especially in casting cannon-balls. The salts of antimony are very poisonous. The protoxide is the active base of tartar emetic and James's powder, and is justly regarded as a most valuable remedy in many diseases. — Yellow antimony, a preparation of antimony, of a deep yellow colour, used in enamel and porcelain painting. It is of various tints, and the brilliancy of the brighter hues is not affected by foul air. — Argentine flossers of antimony, the tetroxide of antimony.

Aphanistic (af-an-ís'tik), a. [Gr. aphanés.] In mineral. indistinct.

Aphanite (af'an-it), n. [Gr. a, priv., and phainó, to appear.] Compact amphibole, a mineral consisting of hornblende, quartz, and felspar so intimately intermixed as to be individually undistinguishable, whence the name.

Aphelion (a-fé'll-on), n. pl. Aphelia (a-fé'll-a). [Gr. apo, from, and hélíos, the sun.] That point of a planet's or comet's orbit which is most distant from the sun: opposed to perihelion.

Aphellan (a-fel'an), n. The name of a bright star in the constellation Gemini.

Apherensis (a-fé'rě-ns), n. Same as Apherensis.

Aphides, Aphids (áf'i-déz, af'i-dé), n. pl. Plant-lice; a family of homopterous insects, having for its type the genus Aphis. They are all injurious to vegetation, living on the juices of plants, which they suck with their beaks. Almost every species of plants supports a different variety of these insects, which reside on it in immense numbers. They produce gall excrescences on leaves. See APHIS.

Aphidian (a-fid'i-an), n. An insect of the family Aphides.

Aphidian (a-fid'i-an), a. Pertaining to the Aphis or Aphides.

Aphidivorous (af-i-div'ú-sus), a. [Aphis, aphidis, an aphis, and L. vor, to eat.] Eating, devouring, or subsisting on the aphis or plant-lice.

Aphilanthropy (a-fil-an'thró-pl), n. [Gr. a, neg., and philanthropia—philos, to love, and anthrōpos, man.] 1. Want of love to mankind; want of benevolence.—2. In med. the first stage of melancholy, when solitude is preferred to society.

Aphis (á'fis), n. pl. Aphides (áf'i-déz). [A term of modern origin, perhaps derived from Gr. aphysso, to draw or drink up liquids.] A plant-lice; a puocoon or vine-fetter; one of the insects of the genus Aphis, family Aphidæ. The species are very numerous and destructive; the A. rosæ lives on the rose; the A. fabæ on the bean; the A. humuli is injurious to the hop, the A. lanigera or woolly aphis equally so to apple-trees. The aphides are furnished with an infected beak, and feelers longer than the thorax. In the same species some individuals have four erect wings, and others are entirely without wings. The feet are of the ambulatory kind, and the abdomen usually ends in two horn-like tubes, from which is ejected the substance called honey-dew. The aphides illu-trate parthenogenesis; hermaphrodite forms produced from eggs produce viviparous wingless forms, which again produce others like themselves, and thus multiply during summer, one individual giving rise to millions. Winged sexual forms appear late in autumn, the females of which, being impregnated by the males, produce eggs.

Aphlogistic (af-lo-jis'tik), a. [Gr. a, priv., and phlogistos, inflammable.] Flameless; as, an aphlogistic lamp, in which the wick, usually of platinum wire, is kept constantly red hot by the slow combustion of alcohol, heated by the wire itself.

Aphnology (af-nól'o-jí), n. [Gr. aphnos, wealth, and logos, a discourse.] The science of wealth; a treatise on the science of wealth; plutology.

The title ought to have been Aphnology. Aphnas, or aphenos, expresses wealth in the largest sense of general abundance and well-being.

Sir W. Herschel.

Aphonia, Aphony (a-fó-ni-a, af'ó-ni), n. [Gr. a, priv., and phónē, voice.] A loss of voice; dumbness; speechlessness.

Aphonous (af'ó-nus), a. [See APHONIA.] Destitute of voice.

Aphorism (af'or-izm), n. [Gr. aphorismos, a short pithy sentence, from aphorizō, to mark out, to define—apo, from, and horos, a boundary.] A precept or principle expressed in a few words; a detached sentence containing some important truth; a maxim; as, the aphorisms of Hippocrates, or of the civil law.

The three commentators on Hippocrates have given the same definition of an aphorism, namely, 'a succinct saying; comprehending a complete statement.' The first aphorism of Hippocrates is, 'Life is short, but art is long.'

Fleming.

—Aphorism, Axiom, Maxim, Apophthegm, Adage, Proverb, Byword, Saw, all concur in expressing a short pregnant saying, generally in one sentence. Aphorism, a truth pointedly set forth, relating rather to speculative principles, ethics, or science than to practical matters. It is the brief statement of a doctrine. 'Moderation is the silken string running through the pearl-chain of all virtues.' 'Malignities are cured by nature, not by remedies,' are aphorisms. Axiom, a statement claiming to be considered as a self-evident truth relating to pure science, frequently assumed as a basis for argument or demonstration; as, 'A straight line is the shortest distance between any two points.' 'Things which are equal to the same thing are equal to one another.' Maxim, a truth, though not so definite as the axiom, yet equally acceptable to the mind, and referring rather to practical than to abstract truth, as to morals, policy, conduct, and the like. It suggests a lesson more pointedly and directly than an aphorism, and is the basis of a rule for conduct. It differs from a precept in that the latter is a direct injunction, whereas a maxim is the mere statement of a truth from which a precept may be deduced. 'Honesty is the best policy.' 'The hand of the diligent maketh rich,' are maxims. Apophthegm is in common matters what the aphorism is in higher. It is essentially a terse saying that makes on us a vivid impression. Thus, 'God helps them that help themselves.'

He that fights and runs away
May fight again another day.

are apophthegms. Adage and proverb are habitual sayings embodying the common sense of mankind on ordinary subjects. The adage, however, refers generally to a specific truth, and is conveyed directly. 'Necessity has no law.' 'Adversity is the best teacher,' or, as the Greeks put it, 'What-ever hurts us instructs us,' are adages. The proverb is usually allegorical, conveying a general truth to a figure based on a specific instance, and is generally more vulgar than the adage. "Burned halves dread the fire," "Old birds are not to be caught with chaff," "Too many cooks spoil the broth," are proverbs. Synonym differs from adage and proverb in that it rarely conveys any important sentiment, and of later times has assumed a contemptuous meaning. A saw is properly the saying of a particular neighbourhood, and is often vulgar and obliging to ignorance or superficiality.

Aphorismatic (af-er-is-mat'ik), a. Same as aphorismic.

Aphorismar (af-er-is-mär), n. A dealer in aphorisms. "The tribe of aphorismers," Adams.

Aphorismic (af-er-is-mik), a. Relating to or containing aphorisms.

The style of Joan is a sort of motto the use of which is a sort of business of thought and expression. When he gets out of the aphorismal matter into a sentence of five or six lines long, nothing can exceed the monotony of the English. Coleridge Aphorist (af-er-lat), n. A writer of aphorisms.

We took the occasion of further clearing and justifying what he had written against the aphorism. De Voltaire

Aphoristic, Aphoristical (af-er-lat'ik, af-er-lat'ik-al), a. Pertaining to or resembling aphorisms, containing aphorisms, in the form of an aphorism, in the form of short unconnected sentences, as, an aphoristic style.

The method of the book is aphoristic. De Quincey

Aphoristically (af-er-lat'ik-al-ly), adv. In the form or manner of aphorisms.

These being carried down seldom with a cure, as Hippocrates aphoristically tells us. Horace

Aphorize (af-er-iz), v. To make aphorisms. Coleridge

Aphris (af-ris), n. [Gr aphros, froth.] A sub-variety of carbonate of lime or calc-spar, popularly known as foam or foam-spar, or curving in small masses, solid, or tender and friable. It is composed of lamellæ or scales, of a pearly lustre, and is connected by insensible shades with argentine.

Aphrisite (af-ris-it), n. [Gr aphris, to foam, aphros, foam, from its appearance.] A variety of limestone.

Aphrodisiac, Aphrodisiacal (af-ro-diz'ik, af-ro-diz'ik-al), a. [Gr aphrodisia, aphrodisia, venereal from Aphrodite, goddess of love among the Greeks.] Exciting venereal desire, increasing the appetite for sexual connection.

Aphrodisiacs (af-ro-diz'ik), n. Food or medicine believed to be capable of exciting sexual desire.

Aphrodite (af-ro-diz'), n. [Gr Aphrodite, the goddess of love, Venus, from aphros, the foam of the sea.] 1. The Greek name of the goddess of love called by the Romans Venus. She is supposed to have originated from the foam of the sea. 2. A variety of meorichium. It is a hydrous silicate of magnesia. 3. A beautiful genus of anemone, with silky hair and bristles. See SEA HOUSE.

Aphthæ (af-thæ), n. pl. [Gr aphthæ] In and small white ulcers upon the tongue, gums, inside of the lips, and palate, resembling particles of curdled milk. Commonly called thrush or St. John's.

Aphthitæ (af-thi'tæ), n. Prismatoidæ glauber salt.

Aphthong (af-thong), n. [Gr a, priv., and thong, sound.] A letter or combination of letters which, in the customary pronunciation of a word, have no sound. [Rare]

Aphthous (af-thous), a. [See APTHOUS.] In and pertaining to thrush, of the nature of thrush or ulcerous affections of the mouth.

Aphyllæ (af-yil'), n. pl. [See APHYLLÆ.] A section of cryptogamic plants without true leaves, generally called Thallophytes, comprising lichens, fungi, and algae.

Aphyllous, Aphyllous (af-yil'ous, or af-yil'ous), a. [Gr a, neg., and phyllon, l. folium, a leaf.] In and destitute of leaves applied to the group of cryptogamic plants called thallophytes, which are without true leaves. Applied also to flowering plants that are destitute of leaves, like some ephorbia.

Aphylous (af-yil'ous), n. pl. [L. aphylus, paraly.] A term sometimes used to designate the next order (mbelliferæ) which use.

Aptarian (ap-i'ti-an), a. Relating to bees.

Aptarian (ap-i'ti-an), n. A bee-keeper, an apiarist.

Aptarist (ap-i'ti-rist), n. One who keeps an apiary, one who keeps bees, or studies the nature of bees, a bee-master.

Apiary (ap-i-ri), n. [L. apiarium, from apis, a bee.] The place where bees are kept, a stand or shed for bees.

Apical (ap'ik-al), a. Relating to the apex or tip, belonging to the pointed end of a cone-shaped body.

Apices, Apices, pl. of apex (which see).

Apician (ap-i-shan), a. [From Apician, a celebrated Roman gourmand.] Relating to or resembling Apicius, relating to culinary or delicate viands, peculiarly refined or dainty as regards cookery.

Apicillary (ap-i-sha-ri), a. [L. apex, apicis, apex.] Situated at or near the apex.

Apiculate, Apiculated (ap-i-sha-lit, ap-i-sha-lit-ed), a. [L. apex, apicis, a sharp point.] In and tipped with a short and abrupt point applied to a leaf or any other part which is minutely terminated by a distinct point.

Apiculture (ap-i-kyul-tür), n. The art of managing bees in hives, bee-keeping.

Apiculus (ap-i-sha-lus), n. [L. dim. of apex.] Is but a small point formed by the projection of the midrib beyond the leaf.

Apices (ap'is), adv. [From a, and pice.] To each, as the apex of each, as, here is an average apices, &c. Each by itself, by the individual, as, they cost a shilling apices.

comprise the Monotremata and Marsupialia, the two lowest orders of mammals, including the duck mole, the porcupine ant-eater, kangaroo, &c. The young are born at a much more immature stage of development than in the placental mammals, and are so helpless that they are unable even to suck, and have, in most cases, to be fed by the mother herself upon the teats, whilst the milk is forced into their mouths by a muscle which is spread over the mammary gland.

Apinastic (ap-in-as'tik), a. [Gr a, priv., and pinastis, to wander.] Is apinastic, not accompanied with aberration, corrective of aberration, specifically applied to reflectors, lenses, and combinations of them, capable of transmitting light without spherical aberration. — Apinastic lens, a lens having the proper figure and constructed of different media to correct the effects of the unequal refrangibility of the different rays.

Apinastic telescope or microscope, an instrument having two or more lenses so combined as to correct the aberration of light. This they effect by neutralizing or compensating the aberrations of each other.

Apinastism (ap-in-as'tizm), n. Is apinastism, the condition of being free from spherical aberration.

Apinastic (ap-in-as'tik), a. [Gr a, priv., and pinastis, to wander.] Not pinastic, not easily moulded.

Apinon (ap-in-on), n. [Fr., the state of being perpendicular or true to the plumb-line, perpendicularity, enfil, perpendicular.] A self-correction springing from perfect self-confidence, assurance.

Apinon (ap-in-on), n. [Gr apinon, from apinon, simple.] A rare variety of garnet, found in dodecahedra, with rhombic faces.

Apinon (ap-in-on), n. [Gr apinon, simple, and apinon, a cutting.] In every simple cutting or incision.

Apinon (ap-in-on), n. [L. Gr apinon.] An ornament carried on the stem of ancient Greek and Roman ships. It was frequently shaped like a plume of feathers. The apinon rose immediately behind the sternman, and served when of considerable size in some degree to protect him from wind and rain.

Apinon (ap-in-on), n. [Gr apinon, Apinon, from its dirty grey colour, a priv., and pinon, to wash.] The sea-hare, a genus of gastropodous molluscs, of the order Tectibranchiata. Some of the species have the power of discharging a fluid of a deep purple colour, by which when in danger, they can discolor the water for a considerable distance around. A depilatory sea-hare, is found in the European seas adhering to rocks, and it was long sup-

A depilatory sea-hare, is found in the European seas adhering to rocks, and it was long supand prophecy; the patron of physicians, shepherds, and founders of cities. He invented the harp or lyre, and was the father of Æsculapius.—Apollo Belvidere, a celebrated statue of Apollo in the Belvidere gallery of the Vatican palace at Rome, esteemed one of the noblest representations of the human frame, and one of the finest pieces of sculpture extant. It was discovered among the ruins of ancient Antium in the reign of Nero.

Apollyon (a-pol'yon), n. [Gr. apollyōn, destroying, pnr. of apollyō, to destroy utterly—apo, from, or utterly, and ollyōn, to destroy.] The destroyer; a name used (Rev. ix. 11) for the angel of the bottomless pit, answering to the Hebrew Abaddon.

Apologetic, Apologetical (a-pol'o-jet'ik, a-pol'o-jet'ik-al), a. [Gr. apologētikos, from apologēma, to speak in defence of—apo, from, and logos, speech.] Of or pertaining to or containing apology; defending by words or arguments; said or written in defence, or by way of apology; excusing; as, an apologetic essay.

Apologetically (a-pol'o-jet'ik-al-ly), adv. In an apologetic manner; by way of apology or excuse.

Apologetics (a-pol'o-jet'iks), n. [See APOLOGISTIC.] That branch of theology which has for its object a systematic arrangement of those external and internal evidences of Christianity, or of the Holy Scriptures, by which Christians are enabled scientifically to justify and defend the peculiarities of their faith, and to answer its opponents.

Apologist (a-pol'o-jist), n. One who makes an apology; one who speaks or writes in defence of another.

Apologize (a-pol'o-jiz), v.i. pret. & pp. apologized; ppr. apologizing. To make an apology; to write or speak in favour, or to make excuse; to plead in defence; followed by for; as, my correspondent apologized for not answering my letter.

Apologise (a-pol'o-jiz), v.t. To make or write an apology for; to defend.

Therefore the Christians, in his time, were apologized by Pline the second. Dr. G. Benson.

Apologiser (a-pol'o-jiz-er), n. One who makes an apology or defends.

Apologue (ap'o-log), n. [Gr. apologos, an apologue, a fable—apo, from, and logos, discourse.] A moral fable; an allegory; a story or relation of fictitious events intended to convey useful truths. An apologue differs from a parable in this: the parable is drawn from events which pass among mankind, and is therefore supported by probability; an apologue may be founded on supposed actions of brutes or inanimate things, and therefore does not require to be supported by probability. Æsop's fables are good examples of apologies.

Apologuer (ap'o-log-er), n. One who writes apologies; a fabler. Burton.

Apology (a-pol'o-ji), n. [Gr. apologia, a defence—apo, away from, and logos, a discourse.] 1. Something said or written in defence or justification of what appears to others wrong or unjustifiable, or of what may be liable to disapprobation; defence; justification; vindication.

I shall neither trouble the reader nor myself with any apology for publishing these sermons. Tillotson.

Bishop Watson's 'Apology for the Bible' is a good book with a bad title. R. Hall.

2. An acknowledgment, usually accompanied by an expression of regret, for some improper remark or act; as, he made a handsome apology for his rudeness.—3. Something that only serves a purpose in the lack of better; a temporary substitute; a makeshift.

He wears a wisp of black silk round his neck, without any stiffener, as an apology for a neckerchief. Dickens.

Apomecometer (ap'o-mé-kom'et-er), n. [See APOMECOMETRY.] An instrument used in measuring heights, constructed in accordance with the principles which govern the sextant.

Apomecometry (ap'o-mé-kom'et-ri), n. [Gr. apo, away, mékos, distance, and metron, measure.] The art of measuring things distant.

Aponeuography (ap'o-nū-rōg'ra-fi), n. A description of aponeuroses.

Aponeurology (ap'o-nū-rōl'o-ji), n. 1. The anatomy of aponeuroses.—2. A treatise on aponeuroses.

Aponeurosis (ap'o-nū-rō'sis), n. pl. Aponeuroses (ap'o-nū-rō'séz). [Gr. aponeurōsis—apo, from, and neurōn, a nerve, because formerly supposed to be an expansion of a nerve or nerves. See NERVE.] A white, shining, and very resisting membrane, composed of interlaced fibres. Some are continuous with muscular fibre, and differ from tendons, of which they are the expansions, only in being flat; others surround the voluntary muscles and keep them in their places; others protect large arteries.

Aponeurotic (ap'o-nū-rōt'ik), a. Relating to the aponeuroses.

Aponeurotomy (ap'o-nū-rōt'o-mi), n. [Gr. apo, neurōn, a nerve, and tōmē, a cutting.] Dissection of the aponeuroses.

Apopemptic (ap-o-pemp'tik), a. [Gr. apopemptikos, valedictory—apo, from, and pempō, to send.] Sung or addressed to a stranger on his departure from a place to his own country; valedictory.

Apopemptic (ap-o-pemp'tik), n. A song or hymn addressed to a stranger on his departure to his own country.

Apopetalous (ap-o-pet'al-us), a. [Gr. apo, away, and E. petal (which see).] In bot. having the leaves of the perianth-whorl not coherent but free; elautheropetalous. Sachs.

Apophasis (a-po'a-sis), n. [Gr. apo, from, and phasis, form of speech.] In rhet. a figure of speech by which the speaker seems to waive what he would plainly insinuate; as, 'I will not mention another argument, which, however, if I should you could not refute.'

Apophlegmatic (ap'o-fleg-mat'ik), a. [Gr. apo, from, and phlegma, phlegm. See PHLEGMATIC.] In med. having the quality of exciting discharges of phlegm or mucus from the mouth or nostrils.

Apophlegmatism (ap'o-fleg'mat-izm), n. 1. Something which excites discharges of phlegm.—2. The action of apophlegmatic medicines.

Apophthegm (ap'o-them), n. [Gr. apo, from, and phthegma, word.] A short, pithy, and instructive saying; a terse remark, conveying some important truth; a sententious precept or maxim. Written also Apothegm.

Of Blackmore's attainments in the ancient tongues it may be sufficient to say that he has founded an aphorism with an apophthegm. Macaulay.

—Aphorism, Axiom, Maxim, Apophthegm, Adage, Proverb, Byword, Saw. See under APHORISM.

Apophthegmatic, Apophthegmatical (ap'o-theg-mat'ik, ap'o-theg-mat'ik-al), a. 1. Pertaining to or having the character of an apophthegm; containing an apophthegm or apophthegms; sententious.—2. Given to the use of apophthegms. Written also Apothegmatic, Apothegmatical.

Apophthegmatist (ap'o-theg-mat-ist), n. A collector or maker of apophthegms. Martinus Scriblerus.

Apophthegmatize (ap'o-theg-mat-iz), v.i. To utter apophthegms, or short instructive sentences.

Apophyge (a-po-fi-je), n. [Gr. apo, from, and phygē, flight.] In arch. the part of a column where it springs out of its base, usually moulded into a concave sweep or cavetto. It is sometimes called the scape or spring of the column.

Apophyllite (a-po-fi-lit or ap'o-fi-lit), n. [Gr. apo, from, and phyllon, a leaf; so called because of its tendency to exfoliate.] A mineral of the zeolite family, occurring in laminated masses or in regular prismatic crystals, having a strong and peculiar pearly lustre. Its structure is foliated, and when a fragment is forcibly rubbed against a hard body it separates into thin laminae like se-lenite. It exfoliates also under the blow-pipe. From its peculiar lustre it is sometimes called Ichthyophthalmite, that is, fish-eye stone. It is a hydrated silicate of lime and potash, and also contains fluorine.

Apophyllous (a-po-fi-lus or ap'o-fi-lus), a. [Gr. apo, away, and phyllon, a leaf.] In bot. having a single perianth-whorl with free leaves; elautherophyllous. Sachs.

Apophysis (a-po-fi-sis), n. pl. Apophyses (a-po-fi-séz). [Gr. —apo, from, and physis, growth.] 1. In anat. a process or regular prominence or swelling; a prominent part of a bone, forming a continuous part of the body of the bone, in distinction from epiphysis (which see).—2. In bot. a swelling under the base of the theca or spore-case of some mosses, as in Splachnum.

Apoplectic, Apoplethical (ap-o-plek'tik, ap-o-plek'tik-al), a. [See APOPLEXY.] 1. Pertaining to or consisting in apoplexy; as, an apoplectic fit.—2. Predisposed to apoplexy; as, an apoplectic habit of body.—3. Serving to cure apoplexy.

Apoplectic (ap-o-plek'tik), n. A person affected with apoplexy.

Apoplex (ap'o-pleks), n. Apoplexy. 'Replections, apoplex, intestate death.' Dryden. [Poetical.]

Apoplexet (ap'o-plekst), a. Affected with apoplexy or paralysis. 'Sure that sense is apoplexet.' Shak.

Apoplexions (ap-o-plek'shus), a. Consisting in or having the character of apoplexy. 'Apoplexions and other congenerous diseases.' Arbutnot.

Apoplexy (ap'o-plek-si), n. [Gr. apoplexia, a being disabled in body or mind by a stroke, apoplexy—apo, from, and pleōo, to strike.] Abolition or sudden diminution of sensation and voluntary motion, from suspension of the functions of the cerebrum, resulting from congestion or rupture of the blood-vessels of the brain. The premonitory symptoms of this dangerous disease are drowsiness, giddiness, dulness of hearing, frequent yawning, disordered vision, noise in the ears, vertigo, &c. It is accompanied with speechlessness, stertorous breathing, heavy sleep, and slow pulse. It is most frequent between the ages of fifty and seventy. Apoplexy is now used by many writers to mean any sudden engorgement or effusion of blood into an organ or tissue; hence we speak of cerebral, pulmonary, renal, cutaneous, &c. apoplexy. Sunstroke is sometimes termed heat apoplexy.

Aporia (a-pō-ri-a), n. [Gr. aporía, difficulty, doubt, from apores, without passage—a, priv., and poros, way or passage.] 1. In rhet. a real or professed doubting or being at a loss where to begin or what to say on account of the variety of matter.—2. In med. febrile anxiety; uneasiness; restlessness, from obstructed perspiration or the stoppage of any natural secretion.

Aporon, Aporime (ap'o-rim, ap'o-rim), n. [See APORIA.] A problem difficult to be resolved.

Aporosa (ap-o-rō-sa), n. pl. [Gr. apores, without passage.] A group of corals of the sclerodermic section, having the 'corallum' or calcareous cup solid, and not perforated with minute apertures.

Aporose (ap-o-rō-sa), a. Not porous; more specifically, belonging to those corals called Aporosa.

Aporthais (ap-or-thā-is), n. [Gr. aporthēō, to flow away; name suggested by its spout-like form.] A genus of marine gasteropod molluscs, family Cerithiidae, containing the well-known pelican's foot or spout-shell (A. pes-pelicanus).

Aposepalous (ap-o-sep'al-us), a. [Gr. apo, away, and E. sepal (which see).] Same as Apotepalous.

Aposepidin (ap-o-sep'i-din), n. [Gr. apo, away, and sepidon, putrefaction.] Leucin (which see).

Apoteopsals (ap'o-si-ō-pē-sis), n. [Gr. apoteōpsis—apo, from, and siōpsā, to be silent.] In rhet. reticency or suppression, as when a speaker, for some cause, as fear, sorrow, anger, or mere effect, suddenly breaks off his discourse before it is ended; or speaks of a thing when he makes a show as if he would say nothing on the subject; or aggravates what he pretends to conceal by uttering a part and leaving the remainder to be understood; as, his character is such—but it is better I should not speak of that.

Apostasis (a-pos'ta-sis), n. [Gr. See APOSTASY.] 1. In old med. the termination or crisis of a disease by some secretion or critical discharge, in opposition to metastasis, or the termination by transfer to some other part. Hence.—2. In anat. imposthume, or abscess.—3. The throwing off or separation of exfoliated or fractured bones.

Apostasy (a-pos'ta-si), n. [Gr. apostasia, a standing away from, a defection—apo, from, and stas, to stand.] 1. An abandonment of what one has professed; a total desertion or departure from one's faith, principles, or party.

The canon law defines apostasy to be a wilful departure from that . . . faith which any person has professed himself to hold. Ayliffe.

2. In med. apostasis (which see).

Apostata (a-pos'ta-ta), n. An apostate.

Apostate (a-pos'tat), n. [Gr. apostata. See APOSTASY.] 1. One who has forsaken the church, sect, or profession to which he before adhered: in its original sense applied to one who has abandoned his religion, but correctly applied also to one who abandons a political or other party.—2. In the R. Cath. Ch. one who, without a legal dispensation, forsakes a religious order of which he has made profession.—Convers. Freshlyte, Apostata, Pervert. See under CONVERT.

Apostate (a-pos'tāt), a. False; traitorous. The apostate lord. Macaulay.

Apostate (a-pos'tāt), v.t. To apostatize.

Had Peter been truly inspired by God, . . . he would not have apostatized from his purpose. Fuller.

Apostatical (ap-o-stat'ik-al), a. After the manner of an apostate. 'An heretical and apostatical church.' Bp. Hall.

Apostatize (a-pos'tā-tīz), v.t. pret. & pp. apostatized; ppr. apostatizing. To abandon one's profession or church; to forsake principles or faith which one has professed, or the party to which one has been attached.

He apostatized from his old faith in fact, took to believing in semblances. Carlyle.

Apostaxis (ap-o-stak'sis), n. [Gr. apo, away, from, and stasis, to drop.] 1. In old med. the dropping of any fluid, as of blood from the nose.—2. In bot., an abnormal discharge of the juices of plants, as the gumming of the plum.

Apostemate (a-pos'tē-māt), v.t. To form into an abscess; to swell and fill with pus.

Apostemation (a-pos'tē-mā'shon), n. The formation of an abscess; the process of gathering into an abscess. Written corruptly Impostemation.

Apostematous (ap-o-tem'at-us), a. Pertaining to an abscess; partaking of the nature of an abscess.

Aposteme (ap'o-tem), n. [Gr. apostēma, distance, a large deep-seated ulcer—apo, from, and histēmi, to stand.] An abscess; a swelling filled with purulent matter. Written also corruptly Imposteme.

A posteriori (a-pos'tē-ri-ō-ri), [L. posterior, after.] A phrase denoting a mode of reasoning founded on observation of effects, consequences, or facts, whereby we reach the causes; inductive; opposed to a priori.

Apothema (ap'o-tem), n. Same as Aposteme.

Apostil, Apostill (a-pos'til), n. [Fr. apostille. See POSTIL.] A marginal note or reference; a postscript.

Apostle (a-pos'l), n. [Gr. apostolos, one sent forth, a messenger, in New Testament Gr. an apostle—apo, forth, and stello, to send.]

1. A person deputed to execute some important business; but specifically, a disciple of Christ commissioned to preach the gospel. Twelve persons were selected by Christ for this purpose; and Judas, one of the number, proving an apostate, his place was supplied by Matthias, Acts i. 26. The title of apostle is applied to Christ himself, Heb. iii. 1. In the primitive ages of the church other ministers were called apostles, Rom. xvi. 7. This title was also given to persons who first planted the Christian faith in different parts of the world. Thus Dionysius of Corinth is called the apostle of France; and the Jesuit missionaries are called apostles.—2. In law, a brief statement of a case sent by a court whence an appeal has been taken to a superior court; a sense which belonged to the L. apostolus among the Roman jurists.—3. In the Great Ch. a book containing the epistles of St. Paul, printed in the order in which they are to be read in churches throughout the year.—4. Naut. a knight-head or bollard-limber where hawsers and heavy ropes are lashed.—Apostles' creed, a confession of faith supposed to have been drawn up by the apostles. This creed as it now stands in the liturgy of the English Church is to be found in the works of St. Ambrose, bishop of Milan, in the fourth century.—Apostles' gens, in the middle ages the apostles were often symbolized under the names of various gens; thus, St. Peter was symbolized by Jasper, St. Andrew by sapphires, St. John by emerald, St. Matthew by chrysolite, &c.—Apostles' ointment, an ointment formerly used, owing its virtues greatly to the fact that it was composed of twelve ingredients, resins, gums, wax, oil, vinegar, verdigris, &c., thus corresponding in number to the apostles.—Apostles' spoon, a spoon of silver gilt, with a handle terminating in the figure of an apostle, one or more of which formed the usual present of sponsors to the infant at christenings. Thus when Cranmer (Shak. Hen. VIII.) declines being sponsor to the prince, the king replies, 'Come, my lord, you would save your spouse.'

Apostleship (a-pos'l-ship), n. The office or dignity of an apostle.

Apostle-spoon (a-pos'l-spōn), n. Same as Apostles' spoon (which see under APOSTLE). B. Jonson.

Apostolate (a-pos'tol-āt), n. 1. The dignity or office of an apostle; a mission. 'When Judas had miscarried, and lost his apostolate.' Jer. Taylor. Specifically.—2. The dignity or office of the pope: the holder of the apostolic see. See under APOSTOLIC.

Apostolic, Apostolical (ap-o-sol'ik, ap-o-sol'ik-al), a. 1. Pertaining or relating to or characteristic of an apostle, or more especially of the twelve apostles; as, the apostolic age. 2. According to the doctrines of the apostles; delivered or taught by the apostles; as, apostolic faith or practice.—Apostolic Constitutions and Canons, a collection of regulations attributed to the apostles, but generally supposed to be spurious. They appeared in the fourth century; are divided into eight books, and consist of rules and precepts relating to the duty of Christians, and particularly to the ceremonies and discipline of the church.—Apostolic fathers, the Christian writers who during any part of their lives were contemporary with the apostles. There are five—Clement, Barnabas, Hermas, Ignatius, Polycarp.—Apostolic king, a title granted by the pope to the kings of Hungary, first conferred on St. Stephen the founder of the royal line of Hungary, on account of what he accomplished in the spread of Christianity.—Apostolic see, the Church of Rome: so called because the popes profess themselves to be the successors of Peter, as the chief of the apostles.—Apostolic succession, the uninterrupted succession of bishops, and through them, of priests and deacons (these three orders of ministers being called the apostolical orders), in the church by regular ordination from the first apostles down to the present day. All Episcopal churches hold theoretically, and the Roman Catholic Church and many members of the English Church strictly, that such succession is essential to the officiating priest, in order that grace may be communicated through his ministrations. But a new race of divines was already rising in the Church of England. In their view the episcopal office was essential to the welfare of a Christian society, and to the efficacy of the most solemn ordinances of religion. To that office belonged certain high and sacred privileges which no human power could give or take away. A church might as well be without the doctrine of the Trinity, or the doctrine of the incarnation, as without the apostolical orders; and the Church of Rome, which, in the midst of all her corruptions, had retained the apostolical orders, was nearer to primitive purity than those reformed societies which had rashly set up, in opposition to the divine model, a system invented by men. Macaulay.

—Apostolical church, the church in the time of the apostles, constituted according to their design; specifically, a name given to the four churches of Rome, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem.

Apostolical (ap-o-sol'ik), n. 1. A member of one of certain sects which arose at various times: so called from their pretending to imitate the practice of the apostles, abstaining from marriage, from wine, flesh, pecuniary reward, &c., and wandering about clothed in white, with long beards and bare heads.—2. A priest who obtained a letter from the pope to a vacant benefice.—3. An archbishop.

Apostolically (ap-o-sol'ik-al-ly), adv. In an apostolical manner.

Apotactite (ap-o-tak'tit), n. [Gr. apotaktos, set apart, from apotatō, to renounce—apo, from, and tatō, to ordain.] One of a sect of ancient Christians, who, in imitation of the first believers, renounced all their effects and possessions.

Apotelesm (a-po'tel-ēzm), n. [Gr. apotelesma, an effect of the stars, from apoteleō, to complete—apo, from, and telos, the end.] 1. The result or termination of a disease. Dunglison.—2. The calculation of a nativity. Bailey.

Apotelesmatic (ap'o-tel-ēz-mat'ik), a. [Gr. apotelesmatikos. See APOTELISM.] Relating to astrology; teaching by the science of the stars.

Apothecary (a-poth'e-ka-ri), n. [L. apothecarius, the keeper of a shop, store, or magazine, from Gr. apothēkē, a repository—apo, away, and thēkē, a chest, from titēmi, to place. The Gr. apothēkē, we may mention, appears in It. as bottega, in Fr. as boutique, a shop, in Sp. as bodega, a wine cellar.] One who practises pharmacy; a skilled person who prepares drugs for medicinal uses, and keeps them for sale. Formerly the apothecary merely compounded and dispensed the prescriptions of the physician and surgeon. In England and Ireland the term is now specifically applied to an inferior sort of practitioners, who are licensed to practise medicine and at the same time deal in drugs. The apothecary cannot charge for both advice and medicine, but must make his election and charge for either singly. In Scotland the apothecary, as such, is only a dispenser of drugs.—Apothecaries' Company, one of the worshipping companies of London incorporated by royal charter in 1606. It is empowered to grant a qualification to practise medicine.—Apothecaries' Hall, the hall of the corporation of apothecaries of London where genuine medicines are prepared and sold under their direction.—Apothecaries' weight, the weight employed in dispensing drugs, differing only in its subdivisions from troy weight.

Apothecium (ap-o-thē-si-um), n. pl. Apothecia (ap-o-thē-si-a). [Gr. apo, away, and thēkē, a case to put anything in, a capsule. See APOTHECARY.] In bot. the receptacle of lichens, consisting of the spore-cases or asci, and of the paraphyses or barren threads. It is either expanded in the form of a round horny shield, as in the gymnocarpous lichens, or is contained in a cavity having an orifice through which the spores escape, as in the angiocarpous lichens.

Apothegm (ap'o-thēm), n. Same as Apothegm.

Apothegmatic, Apothegmatical (ap'o-theg-mat'ik, ap'o-theg-mat'ik-al), a. Same as Apothegmatic, Apothegmatical. 'A witty apothegmatical comparison.' T. Warton.

Apotheosis (ap'o-thē-ō'sis or ap-o-thē-ō-sis), n. [Gr. apothēsis—apo, away, and Theos, God.] Deification; consecration; the act of placing a prince or other distinguished person among the heathen deities. This honour was often bestowed on illustrious men in Rome.

A regular custom was introduced, that on the decease of every emperor who had neither lived nor died like a tyrant, the senate, by a solemn decree, should place him in the number of the gods; and the ceremonies of his apotheosis were blended with those of his funeral. Gibbon.

Apotheosize (ap'o-thē-ō'siz or ap-o-thē-ō-siz), v.t. To consecrate or exalt to the dignity of a deity; to deify.

promachus, early ripe, promachus being used by Martial for apricots in opposition to parvos or parvæ—parvæ, before, and æquæ, to cook, to make ready, to ripen.] A roundish, pubescent fruit of a delicious flavour, the produce of a tree of the plum-kind, Prunus Armeniaca, nat. order Rosaceæ. Its specific name is due to the belief that it is a native of Armenia; but this opinion has been controverted by M. Ragner, a French naturalist, who asserts that it has not been found wild either in that district or in any of the neighbouring provinces, and states his belief that it is a native of Africa, where it flourishes in such abundance on the oases that the fruit is dried and carried to Egypt as an article of commerce. It was introduced into England in 1524 by the gardener of Henry VIII. The tree rises to the height of from 15 to 20, and even 30 feet, and its flowers appear before its leaves. In its wild state the fruit is agreeably subacid. In gardens the apricot-tree is chiefly raised against walls, and propagated by budding upon plum-tree stocks.

April (ˈæprəl), n. [L. aprilis, contr. from aperilis, the month in which the earth opens for the growth of plants, from aperio, to open. See APERIENT] The fourth month of the year. With poets April is the type of inconsistency, from the variableness of its weather.

April-fool (ä'pril-föl), n. One who is sportively imposed upon by others on the 1st of April, as by being sent on some absurd errand.

A priori (à pri-ô-ri). [L., from something prior or going before.] The opposite of a posteriori, a mode of reasoning by which we proceed from the cause to the effect. To demonstrate anything a priori, means to do it on grounds or reasons preceding actual knowledge or independent of it. Mathematical proofs, for example, are of the a priori kind. On the contrary, judgment or proof founded on knowledge previously acquired, such as the conclusions of natural history and of all experimental science, are termed a posteriori. Plato is the type of a strict a posteriori, Bacon and Locke of a loose a posteriori. Reasoning a priori is called the synthetic method; reasoning a posteriori the analytic. A priori knowledge in the philosophy of Kant, means not knowledge independent of this or that experience, but knowledge independent of all experience, such as the knowledge of the fact that space has three, and no more than three, dimensions. The marks of a a priori knowledge are, first, that it is necessarily true, and second, that it is true of the whole subject.

Apron (k'pron), n. [O.E. appron, apern, apron, napron, napern, napern, an. Fr. napron, from nappe, a table-cloth, etc. (whence E. napkin), nappe being another form of mappe, E. map. Apron has therefore lost an initial a, probably from its being confounded with the a of an the indefinite article; comp. adder, nadder; q't. nest, the last word having received the a.] 1. A piece of cloth or leather worn when at work on the fore-part of the body to keep the clothes clean or defend them from injury. The aprons of silk or other fine material now worn by ladies as a fashionable piece of dress or an ornament are really relics of the time when ladies of rank personally superintended the housekeeping, spending much of their time in the kitchen and larder.—2. Part of the dress of an English bishop, probably the remains of the cassock cut off to the knee.—3. A piece of leather or other material spread before a person riding in a gig or other vehicle, to defend him from rain, mud, dust, and the like.—4. The fat skin covering the belly of a goose. family, by others referred to a distinct family called Aptenodytidae or Spheniscidae. The great penguin (A. patagonicus) is the representative of the genus. See PENGUIN.

Aptenodytidae (ap-tē'no-dit'i-dē), n. pl. A family of natatorial birds, including the genus Aptenodytes. See APTENODYTES, PENGUIN.

Aptera (ap'ter-a), a. pl. [Gr. apteros, without wing, a, priv., and pteron, a wing.] The seventh order of insects in Linnaeus' system, comprising many genera. They belong spiders, bees, earwigs, &c. also locusts, cicada, grasshopper, and shrimp. But later zoologists have distributed these animals very differently, and restricted this term to the orders of insects called Suctoria, Episoa, and Thysanura, which have no wings.

Apteral (ap'ter-al), a. [See above.] 1. Destitute of wings. — 2. In arch. applied to a building which has no series of columns along its flanks or sides, but is either prostyle or amphiprostyle: opposed to peripteral.

Apteran (ap'tēr-an), n. One of the Aptera; a wingless insect.

Apterous (ap'tér-us), a. 1. In zool. destitute of wings: applied to insects of the order Apterá.—2. In bot. destitute of membranous expansions, as a stem or petiole: opposed to glabrous or glated.

Aptrygidae (ap-ter-ij-ēdē), n. pl. One of the two families of birds (Struthionidae being the other) into which the Cursores are divided by some naturalists, comprising only the single genus Aptryx. See APTERYX.

Apteryx (ap'ter-iks), n. [Gr a, priv., and pter, a wing.] A nearly extinct genus of cursorial birds constituting the family Apterygidae, distinguished from the ostriches by having three toes with a rudimentary hallux, which forms a spur, and a very long bill. Of all the Cursorae the Apteryx departs most widely from the general type of the class of birds. Its wings are trifling rudiments, there is no vestige of a tail, its plumage consists of long hair-like feathers, the nostrils are placed at the tip of the bill, and the diaphragm is more complete than in any other bird. There are three species.

worms and insects. Of these the A. australis, called tree-hill or tree-hill by the natives, from its cry, is best known. It is about the size of a small goose, breeds in deep holes, is nocturnal, and is hunted by torchlight for its skin, which is much prized as a material for chiefs' dresses. It defends itself when attacked, inflicting dangerous wounds with its spur armed foot.

Aptitude (ap'ti-tūd), n. [L. aptitudo, from L. aptus, 3d. apt.] The state or quality of being apt, as, (a) a natural or acquired disposition or tendency, as, oil has an aptitude to burn, men acquire an aptitude to particular vices.

He that is about children should learn their nature and aptitudes.

(b) Fitness; suitability. 'Aptitude' for the end to which it was aimed. 'Desire of Power.' (c) Readiness in learning; docility. 'He was a boy of remarkable aptitude.' Macaulay.

Aptitudinal (ap-ti-tūd-in-āl), a. Suitable; fit.

Aptly (ap'tli), adv. In an apt or suitable manner, as, (a) properly, justly, pertinently. 'That part was aptly fitted.' Shak. 'I'm sure very aptly remarks.' Addison. (b) Readily, quickly, cleverly. 'To learn aptly.' Worcester.

Aptness (ap'tness), n. The state or quality of being apt, as, (a) fitness, suitability, as, 'the aptness of things to their end.' Hooker. (b) Disposition of the mind, propensity, as, 'the aptness of men to follow example.' (c) Quickness of apprehension, readiness in learning, docility.

What should be the aptness of birds, in comparison of beasts, to imitate speech may be inquired.

(d) Tendency, use of things, as, the aptness of iron to rust.

Apturnia (ap-tūr-ni-a), n. A fossil bird about the size of a swan, found in New Zealand along with the remains of the moa. Both belong to the same family (Struthionidae) of avian birds.

Aptote (ap'tōt), n. [Gr. apotein, indeclinable — a, priv. and ptotein, verbal adjective from ptō, to fall.] In gram., a noun which has no variation of termination or distinction of case, an indeclinable noun.

Aptotic (ap-tōt-ik), a. Of or pertaining to an aptote, a term applied to a language which has no declensions, &c.

Apus, Apous (ā'pus, ā'pus), n. [Gr. a, not, without, and pus, a foot.] A genus of phylogenetic crustaceans of the sub-class Ectopoda (which see). They inhabit ditches, lakes, and standing waters, generally in insupportable quantities.

Aporetic (ap-rē-tik), a. [Or a, without, and pus, fever, from pus, fire.] Without fever, specifically, in med. applied to those days in which the intermission happens in agues, and also to local affections which are not accompanied with febrile excitement.

Aporetic, Aporetic (ap-rē-tik, ap-rē-tik), n. [Gr. aporetic — a, priv. and pus, fire.] The absence or intermission of fever, the interval between the paroxysms in intermittent fever.

Aporetic (ā'pōr-ē-tik), n. [Gr. aporetic, from a, priv. and pus, fire.] Incombustible, or capable of sustaining a strong heat without alteration of form or proportion, as asbestos, mica, &c. Aporetic bodies differ from those simply refractory, inasmuch as the latter, though they are not fused by heat, may be altered by it, while the former are not even altered.

Aqua (āk-wa), n. [L. This word assumes the form aqua in French; it is allied to Goth. alga, A. Sax. al, Iscl. d, O.H.G. alga, water, river.] Water, a word much used in pharmacy and old chemistry. — Aqua fortis (= strong water), a name given to weak and impure nitric acid. Aqua marina. See AQUAMARINE. — Aqua regia or regia aqua (= royal water), a name given to a mixture of nitric and hydrochloric acids, from its power of dissolving gold and other noble metals. Aqua Tylana, a poisonous fluid made about the middle of the seventeenth century by an Italian woman of the name of Tofana or Toffania, who is said to have procured the death of no fewer than 800 individuals by means of it. It consisted chiefly, it is supposed, of a solution of crystallized arsenic. — Aqua vite (= water of life), a name familiarly applied to native distilled spirits. It answers to the whisky of Scotland, the uiscie beatha of Ireland, the eau de vie of the French. — Aqua ductus or aqua haustus, in Saxo law, two servitudes, the former consisting in a right of carrying a water-course through the grounds of another, the latter, of watering cattle at a river, well, or pond in the ground of another.

Aquamarine (āk-wa-ma-rīn), n. [L. aqua, water, and marinus, pertaining to the sea.] A name for the finest beryl, so called from its bluish or sea-green tint.

Aquarian (ā-kwā-rī-an), n. One of a sect of Christians in the primitive church who consecrated water in the eucharist instead of wine, either under a pretence of abstinence or because it was unlawful to drink wine.

Aquarium (ā-kwā-rī-um), n. [L.] 1. An artificial pond, cistern, or place in a garden or elsewhere for cultivating aquatic plants. — 2. A vessel, or series of vessels constructed wholly or partly of glass in which live animals are kept either in salt or fresh water, along with rocks and aquatic plants. Aquariums on a large scale have been constructed in connection with public parks or gardens, or as distinct institutions, in many cities and towns, as London, Brighton, Berlin, Hamburg, &c.

Aquarius (ā-kwā-rī-us), n. [L.] The Water-bearer, a sign in the zodiac which the sun enters about the first of January, so called from the rains which prevail at that season in Italy and the East.

Aquatile (āk-wa-tīl), a. Inhabiting the water. 'The aquatile or water frog.' St. T. Brown.

Aquatint (āk-wa-tīnt), n. 1. Same as Aquatint. — 2. An engraving in the aquatint method.

Aquatint (āk-wa-tīnt), a. Pertaining to the method of engraving called Aquatint (which see).

Aquatint (āk-wa-tīnt), n. [L. aqua, water, and tint, dye, tint.] A method of etching on copper by which a beautiful effect is produced, resembling a fine drawing in water-colours or Indian ink. This is performed by covering a prepared copper plate with a ground of resin coloured black by powder of asphalt. On this the design is traced, and a complicated series of operations with varnish and dilute aqua fortis is gone through till the effect is produced.

Aquatint (āk-wa-tīnt), n. One who practices the art of aquatinting.

Aquatinting (āk-wa-tīnt-ing), n. The art or process of engraving in the aquatint method.

Aqua-vivarium (āk-wa-vī-vā-rī-um), n. [L. aqua, water, and vivarium, pertaining to living creatures, from vivo, to live.] Same as Aquarium (which see).

Aqueduct (āk-wā-dūkt), n. [L. aqueductus, aqua, water, and ductus, a pipe or canal, from ducere, to lead. See DUCT.] 1. A conduit or channel for conveying water from one place to another more particularly applied to structures for conveying water from distant sources for the supply of large cities. Aqueducts were extensively used by the Romans, and many of them still remain in different places on the Continent. They were constructed of stone or wood, sometimes tunnelled through hills, and carried over valleys and rivers on arches. The aqueduct at Segovia, originally built by the Romans, has in some parts two tiers of arches 100 feet high, is 500 feet in length, and is one of the most admired works of antiquity. The most remarkable aqueduct of modern times is that constructed by Louis XIV. for conveying the waters of the Ebro to Valladolid. The aqueduct of the present day formed of iron pipes has rendered these expansive structures unnecessary. — 2. In anal. a term applied to certain canals occurring in different parts of the body.

Aquity (ā-kwā-ti), n. Wateriness, aqueousness. 'Aquity, torridity, and impurity.' B. Jonson. [Used ludicrously.]

Aqueous (āk-wē-us), a. [From L. aqua, water.] Pertaining to the nature of water, or abounding with or formed by it; watery, as, an aqueous solution. Aqueous humor of the eye, the limpid watery fluid which fills the space between the cornea and the crystalline lens in the eye. See EYE. — Aqueous rock, in geol. mechanically formed rocks, composed of matter deposited by water. Called also Sedimentary or Stratified Rocks. — Aqueous vapour, the gaseous vapour which is produced from the surface of water by evaporation, and which rises into the atmosphere and returns again to the earth in the form of rain, dew, and snow. — Aqueous tint, in painting, a nearly colourless tint.

Aqueousness (āk-wē-us-ness), n. The quality or state of being aqueous or watery, wateriness, wateriness.

Aquista (ā-kwā-ti), n. [It. little water.] A celebrated Italian poison, more commonly known under the name of Aqua Tofana (which see under AQUA).

Aquiferous (ā-kwī-fēr-us), a. [L. aqua, water, and ferre, to bear.] Conducting water or watery fluid, as, the aquiferous system of the sponges, aquiferous vessels.

Aquifolium (āk-wī-fōl-ī-ūm), n. [L. aqua, a needle, and folium, a leaf.] A nat. order of polypetalous exogens; the holly tribe. The species consist of trees and shrubs, with alternate coriaceous leaves, small flowers in axillary cymes, and a fleshy luscious fruit. The useful plants of the order are found in the genus Ilex. The bark of the common holly (I. aquifolium) yields birdlime, and from the leaves of another species, I. paraguayensis, is prepared the 'Maze of Paraguay' tea.

Aquiform (āk-wī-form), a. [L. aqua, water, and forma, form.] In the form of water.

Aquila (āk-wī-lā), n. [L. Bopp and Pott refer this word to the root aq, awt, sharp. See ACT.] 1. A genus of rapacious birds containing the true eagle. See EAGLE. 2. A northern constellation containing, according to the British catalogue, seventy-one stars.

Aquilaria (āk-wī-lā-rī-a), n. The type genus of the nat. order Aquilariaceae (which see).

Aquilariaceæ (ak-wi-lá-rí-á-sé-s), a. pl. [Genus Aquilaria, from L. aquila, an eagle, eagle-wood being the name given to A. Agallocha.] A nat. order of apetalous exogens. The species are trees with smooth branches and a tough bark; alternate, entire leaves and the fruit a capsule, pear-shaped, and valved. The order consists of only three genera—Aquilaria, Ophiopetrum, and Gyrinops. All the species of the order are natives of the East Indies. A. Agallocha yields agallochum, eagle-wood, or eagle-wood. See AGALLOCHUM.

Aquilated (ak-wil-lá-ted), a. In her adorned with eagle's heads, as, a cross aquilated.

Aquilula (ak-wil-lá-lá), n. [From aquila, an eagle, whose claws the spurs of the petals are supposed to resemble.] A genus of acrid plants, nat. order Ranunculaceæ, widely distributed over the temperate parts of the northern hemisphere. The flowers have five flat, elliptical, coloured sepals, alternating with as many spurred petals, the fruit consists of five follicles with numerous seeds. The spurred petals with incurved heads have been compared to five plumes, the sepals representing the wings, and to this the English name columbine refers (from L. columba, a pigeon).

Aquilines (ak-wil-lí-né), a. pl. A sub-family of birds, family Falconidae, order Accipitres or Raptores; the eagles. See EAGLE.

Aquilus (ak-wil-lí-s), a. [L. aquilus. See AQUILA.] Of or belonging to the eagle. 'Aquilus mount.' Fowling.—2. Resembling an eagle's beak, curving; hooked; prominent.

Terrific arch and aquiline his nose. Compos.

Aquilon (ak-wil-lí-on), a. [L. aquila] The north wind. Shakspeare.

Aquitania (ak-wil-lí-tá-ní-a), a. [Celt. Aquid, the name of a people, and tan, country—the country of the Aquid.] Pertaining to Aquitania, one of the great divisions of Gaul, which, according to Cæsar, lay between the Garonne, the Pyrenees, and the ocean, now called Gascony.

Aquila, v. t. To pay for. Chaucer.

Aquosus (á-kwó-s), a. Watery; aqueous.

Aquosity (á-kwó-sí-tí), n. The state of being aqueous or watery, wateriness; moistness.

We do not assume that a something called aquosity entered into and took possession of the sides of hydrogen as soon as it was formed, and then guided the aqueous particles to their places in the faces of the crystal, or among the joints of the hear-stone. Huxley.

Ar (ar), n. [He. ar, Icel. arr, Dan. ar, a year.] A year or climacter, a poem.

Arab (ar-ab), n. [Ar. arabah, a desert.] 1. A native of Arabia.—2. A neglected outcast of the streets, particularly an outcast boy or girl, generally called Street Arab. This use of the word is based on the Arab having no fixed dwelling-place, but being nomadic.

When he read about the street Arab, and of the dangers of the young fry of thieves, he wiped his eyes, and said, 'God bless me!' Mrs. Rochell.

Arab (ar-ab), a. Of or pertaining to the Arabs or Arabia; as, an Arab steed. 'The delicate Arab arch of her feet.' Tennyson.

Araba (ar'-á-ba), n. An Indian or Turkish cart drawn by oxen or cows, and used for

(e) the Roman, or Ormos-Roman, introduced into Rome from the East when pure art was declining, (f) the Arabesque of the Moors, as seen in the Alhambra, introduced by them into Europe in the middle ages, (c) Modern Arabesque, which took its rise in Italy in the Renaissance period of art, on the discovery of the decorations on the baths of Titus, and was speedily brought to perfection by Raffaele and his scholars. The designs of Roman and modern arabesques are generally composed of a fanciful combination of figures of men and animals, real and imaginary, with floral and other ornamental forms. The human figures are generally represented truncated and as growing out of plants or ornaments, or as supported by them, and in this manner. There are, however, many classical and modern arabesques composed entirely of ornamental work, plants, fruits, flowers, and the like. The arabesques of the Moors, who are prohibited by their religion from representing animal forms, consist essentially of complicated ornamental designs based on the suggestion of plant-growth, combined with extremely complex geometrical forms. The colouring of Moorish arabesques is entirely conventional and brilliant, yet harmonious. Raffaele's arabesques on the Loggia of the Vatican owe their excellence to his combining allegory with ornamentation, thus giving poetical expression to what had previously been only a pleasure to the eye.

Clingens-caste Arabesque, from tomb in Church of St. Peter-in-Vinculo, Rome.

Arabesque (ar-ab-ésk), a. In the manner of the Arabians; specifically, its arch relating to or exhibiting the style of ornamentation described in the preceding article.

Arabesque (ar-ab-ésk), v. t. pret. arabesqued, ppr. arabesquing. To enrich with arabesque ornaments. 'With its vermilioned initial letters, so prettily arabesqued.' Edgar.

Arabian (á-rí-bí-an), a. Pertaining to Arabia.

Arabian (á-rí-bí-an), n. A native of Arabia; an Arab.

Arabic (ar-ab-ík), a. Belonging to Arabia or the language of its inhabitants.—Arabic figures or characters, the numeral characters now used in our arithmetic, which were introduced into England about the eleventh century, and are probably of Indian origin.

Arabic (ar-ab-ík), n. The language of the Arabians.

Arabic (ar-ab-ík), a. Arabian, Arabic.

Arabic (ar-ab-ík), v. t. pret. arabiced, ppr. arabicing. To enrich with arabesque ornaments. 'With its vermilioned initial letters, so prettily arabiced.' Edgar.

Arabis (ar'-á-bis), n. [From Arabe, of which the more important species are natives.] A genus of plants of the cruciferous order; wall or rock cress. Several species are natives of Britain, but they are of little interest. Foreign specimens with white or sometimes purple flowers are largely cultivated in rock-work and borders in our gardens.

Arabism (ar'-á-bizm), n. An Arabic idiom or peculiarity of language.

Arabist (ar'-á-bist), n. One well versed in the Arabic language or literature.

Arable (ar'-á-bil), a. [Fr. arable, from L. arabilis, that can be tilled, from arv. to plough, from a widely spread root seen also in Gr. aré, A. Sax. arren, E. to ear, Icel. arja, Goth. arjan, G. arren, arv, O. H. G. arum, arum, Lith. arv, arv, arv, to plough, to till; Ir. W. ar, tillage. W. ar, to plough.] Fit for ploughing or tillage.—Arable land, land which is chiefly cultivated by means of the plough, as distinguished from grass-land, wood-land, common pasture, and waste.

Arabo-tedesco (ar-ab-ó-té-sé-dé-sé), n. [It. from arabe, Arabic, and tedesco, German.] In art, a style of art composed of Moorish, Roman, and German-Gothic. Almost synonymous with Symmetrie.

Aracnæ (ar'-á-kán-é), n. A native or an inhabitant, or natives or inhabitants, of Aracan or Arracan, in provinces of British Burmah.

Aracnæ (ar'-á-kán-é), a. Pertaining to Aracan or its inhabitants.

Aracari (á-rá-á-rí), n. [Native name.] A name of the birds belonging to the genus Pteroglossus, included in the Ramphastidae or toucan family, and differing from the true toucans by a smaller bill and smaller size. The aracaris breed in the hollows of decayed trees, which they enlarge by means of their beak. The prevailing colour of their plumage is green, often varied with spaces or bands of black, or brilliant red and yellow. They are natives of the warm parts of South America.

Araca, v. t. [O. Fr. araca, Fr. arracher, to pull up, from L. eradicare—e. out, and radix, a root.] To tear up by the roots; to draw away by force.

The children from his arm they gouge araca. Chaucer.

Araceæ (á-rí-sé-s), n. pl. A nat. order of monocotyledonous plants, having the genus Aram as the type. The species are herbaceous, with leaves sheathing at the base; the flowers are unisexual and without a perianth, on a spadix protected when young by a spathe, the anthers are nearly sessile, and the fruit succulent. Most of the species have tuberous roots abounding in starch, which forms a wholesome food after the acid juice has been washed out. British or Portland arrow root is manufactured from the roots of Aram maculatum (the water-lily or cuckoo-pint). The species are natives chiefly of tropical countries, and a principle of acidity generally pervades them, existing in so strong a degree in some as to render them dangerous poisons, as Dieffenbachia seguine (the dumb-cane of the West Indies and South America), which receives its popular name from its acid juice swelling the tongue of any one chewing it, and so destroying the power of speech. A gigantic species (Godwinia gigas), discovered in Nicaragua and brought to Britain, produces but one leaf supported on a stalk 10 feet long. See GODWINIA.

Cuckoo-pint or Water-lily (Aram maculatum), a. Spadix. b. Stamens or male flowers. c. Ovary or female flower. d. Spathe or sheath. e. Corolla.

Aracnæ (á-rá-á-né), a. Pertaining to the nat. order of plants Araceæ.

Arachis (ar'-á-kis), n. A genus of leguminous plants much cultivated in warm climates, and esteemed a valuable article of food. The most remarkable feature of the genus is that when the flower falls the stalk supporting the small undeveloped fruit lengthens, and bending towards the ground pushes the fruit into the ground, when it begins to enlarge and ripen. The best-known species is A. hypogæa. Its pod (popularly called ground, earth, or pea nut), when mature, is oblong, often contracted in the middle, wrinkled, of a pale yellow colour, and contains two seeds the size of a hazel nut, in flavour sweet as almonds, and yielding, when pressed, an oil not inferior to that of olives. It grows to the height of 1 or 2 feet.—Arachis oil, the oil expressed from the seeds of Arachis hypogæa, the fine limpid nut-oil of commerce.

Arachnida (á-rá-kál-da), n. pl. [Gr. arachne, a spider, and idion, form.] A class of articulated, annulose, and wingless animals, intermediate between insects and Crustaceans, including spiders, mites, and scorpions. They are oviparous animals, provided with articulated members and a united head and thorax, but they do not undergo a metamorphic change similar to insects. The antennae are modified into long like organs. They respire by tracheae, or by pulmonary sacs, or by the skin.

Arachnida (a-rak-ni-da), n. One of the Arachnids.

Arachnid (a-rak-ni-da), n. (Or arachnid, a spider, and arachne, a spider.) 1. Resembling a spider's web specifically, in bot. seeming to be covered with webbed, in consequence of the entanglement of long white hairs. 2. Pertaining to the Arachnida. - Arachnid canal, in anat. a canal formed by the extension of the arachnid membrane over the transverse and longitudinal fissures of the brain. - Arachnid membrane, in anat. (a) a semi-transparent thin membrane which is spread over the brain and pia mater, and for the most part closely connected with the latter. Also called the Arachnoid membrane. The term has also been applied to that capsule of the crystalline lens which is a continuation of the hyaloid membrane. (b) A membrane supposed by some anatomists to exist between the sclerotic and choroid membranes of the eye.

Arachnoid (a-rak-ni-da), n. 1. A species of medusae occurring fossil. - 2. In anat. the arachnoid membrane or tunic. See under the adjective. - Arachnoid of the eye. See under the adjective. - Arachnoid membrane, (b).

Arachnoiditis, Arachnoiditis (a-rak-ni-da), n. Inflammation of the arachnoid membrane.

Arachnologist (a-rak-ni-da-jist), n. One versed in arachnology.

Arachnology (a-rak-ni-da-jy), n. (Or arachnology, a spider, and logos, discourse.) That branch of natural history which treats of spiders.

Arach (a-rak), n. See ARACH.

Arad (a-rad), n. A member of the natural order Aradon. Lindley.

Arasometer (a-ra-so-mi-ter), n. See ARASOMETER.

Arasomyle (a-ra-so-mi-ly), n. (Or aracis, thin, rare, and mylos, a column.) In anat. a columnar arrangement where the columns are placed far apart. The interval usually assigned is four diameters.

Arasomyia (a-ra-so-mi-a), n. (Or aracis, rare, and myia, a column.) In anat. an arrangement in which columns are coupled or placed in pairs, with an interval generally of half a diameter between the coupled columns, and of three diameters and a half between the pairs.

Arasomys (a-ra-so-mi-s), n. A native or inhabitant, or natives or inhabitants, of the province of Aragon in Spain.

Arasomys (a-ra-so-mi-s), n. Pertaining to Aragon or its inhabitants.

Arasomys (a-ra-so-mi-s), n. (From aracis, rare, and myia, a column.) In anat. a columnar arrangement where the columns are placed far apart. The interval usually assigned is four diameters.

culant berries, the type of the nat. order Aralium (which see).

Aralium (a-ra-li-um), n. A nat. order of plants nearly related to the Umbelliferae, from which they are distinguished chiefly by their three or more calyxes, simple epigynous disc, usually valvate corolla, and more shrubby habit. The species are natives chiefly of the tropical and sub-tropical regions of the world, and are sometimes called ivy-worts. The order is represented in Britain by the Ivy (Hedera Helix). The genus, highly esteemed by the Chinese as a stimulant, is produced by Panax chinensis, a plant found in Northern Asia; the genus of North America (P. quinquefolium) is less valued. A species of Aralia (A. nudicaulis) is used in North America as a substitute for ginseng. The true rice-paper of the Chinese, obtained only from the island of Formosa, is made from the pith of another species, A. papyrifera.

Aramais (a-ra-mai-s), n. Of or pertaining to Aram, a son of Shem, or to the Chaldeans and Syrians, his descendants, Chaldean, Chaldeic, specifically, a term appellative of the northern family of the Semitic class of languages. Written also Aramese, Aramesian.

Aramais (a-ra-mai-s), n. The name applied to the northern group of the Semitic class of languages. It comprises the tongues spoken in Syria and Assyria, the earliest specimens being the Chaldean papyri in the Old Testament and Assyria, especially in Seder and Daniel; Chaldeic; Chaldean.

dored all the more striking that they are continued through the heat of the day when all other birds are silent. It is about the size of a pigeon, but is easily distinguished from it by the strange tubular horn-like structure which grows on its forehead, and when empty of air is pendulous, but rises when the bird is excited to the height of 3 inches. As this horn has a communication with the palate it has probably something to do with the peculiar sound of the bird's voice. Its plumage is pure white.

Archaboutant (Ark-bô-tân), n. [Fr. arc-boutant—arc, an arch, and O. Fr. boutant, ppr. of bouter, to prop.] In arch, an arch-formed buttress. See FLYING-BUTTRESS.

Arch (Arch), n. [Fr. arche, L.L. archia, from L. arcus, a bow, an arch, an arc.] 1. In geom. any part of the circumference of a circle or other curve; an arc. See ARC, 1. — 2. In arch. a structure composed of separate inelastic bodies, having the shape of truncated wedges, arranged on a curved line, so as to retain their position by mutual pressure. Arches are usually constructed of stones or of bricks. The separate stones which compose the arch are called voussairs or arch-stones; the extreme or lowest voussairs are termed springers, and the uppermost or central one is called the keystone. The under or concave side of the voussairs is called the intrados, and the upper or convex side the extrados of the arch. When the curves of the intrados and extrados are concentric or parallel, the arch is said to be extradosed. The supports which afford resting and resisting points to the arch are called piers or abutments. The upper part of the pier or abutment where the arch rests—technically where it springs from—is the impost. The span of an arch is in circular arches the length of its chord, and generally the width between the points of its opposite imposts whence it springs. The rise of an arch is the height of the highest point of its intrados above the line of the cycloidal, elliptical, parabolical, hyperbolical, or catenarian arches; or from the resemblance of the whole contour of the curve to some familiar object, as lancet arch and horse-shoe arch; or from the method used in describing the curve, as equilateral, three-centred, four-centred, ogee, and the like. When any arch has one of its imposts higher than the other it is said to be rampant. — Foil arches, arches whose outlines are curved into a series of subordinate arches called foils, the points of which are termed cusps. A numeral is usually employed to designate the number of foils, as a trafoil arch, a cinqfoil arch, &c. — 3. Any place covered with an arch; as, to pass into the arch of a bridge. — 4. Any curvature in the form of an arch; as, the arch of the sorta.

Whereon a sapphire throne, inlaid with pure Amber, and colours of the flowery arch. Milton.

5. In mining, a place of ground left unworked near a shaft. — Triumphal arch, in Rom. antiq. originally a simple arch festooned and otherwise decorated, erected generally at the entrance of a city, though sometimes in the street, under which a victorious general and army passed in triumph. At a later period the triumphal arch was a richly sculptured, massive, and permanent structure, having an archway passing through it, with generally a smaller arch on either side. The name is sometimes given to an arch, generally of wood decorated with flowers, erected on occasion of some public rejoicing, &c.

Arch (Arch), v. t. 1. To cover or span with an arch; as, to arch a gate.

The proud river . . . is arched over with a curious pile of stones. Howell.

2. To curve or form into the shape of an arch; as, the horse arches his neck. 'Fine devices of arching water without spilling.' Bacon.

Arch (Arch), v. i. To make an arch or arches.

The nations of the field and wood Build on the wave or arch beneath the sand. Pope.

Archæologist (Ark-kô-ô-lô'-jî-ik), n. One skilled in archæology.

Archæology (Ark-kô-ô-lô'-jî), n. [Gr. archaios, ancient, and logos, discourse.] The science of antiquities, especially prehistoric antiquities; that science or branch of knowledge which investigates the history of nations and peoples by means of the remains, architectural, implemental, or the like, which belong to the earlier epoch of their existence. — Archæology, Antiquarianism. Archæology, in its strict application, treats of prehistoric matters, and is thus allied to geology; antiquarianism deals more particularly with subjects within the period embraced by history. Archæology interprets without the aid of written record or trustworthy tradition; antiquarianism avails itself of both.

Archæopteryx (Ark-kô-ôpt'-er-iks), n. [Gr. archaios, ancient, and pteryx, wing.] A unique fossil bird from the oolitic limestone of Solenhofen, of the size of a rook, and differing from all known birds in having two free claws representing the thumb and forefinger projecting from the wing, and about twenty tail vertebrae free and prolonged as in mammals.

Archæus (Ark-ké-us), n. [L.L. archæus, from Gr. arché, beginning.] A term used especially by Paracelsus and Van Helmont, and signifying the vital principle which presides over the growth and continuation of living beings; the principle or power which presides over every particle of organized bodies, and to which it gives form; an immaterial principle existing in the seed prior to fecundation.

Archæic, Archæical (Ark-ké'ik, Ark-ké'ik-al), a. [Gr. archaios, old-fashioned, from archaios, ancient.] Characterized by archæism; obsolete; antiquated.

A person familiar with the dialect of certain portions of Massachusetts will not fail to recognize, in ordinary discourse, many words now noted in English vocabularies as archæic; the greater part of which were in common use about the time of the King James translation of the Bible. Shakespeare stands less in need of a glossary to most New Englanders than to many a native of the old country. J. R. Lowell.

Archæology (Ark-kô-ô-lô'-jî), n. Same as Archæology.

Archæism (Ark-ké-izm), n. [Fr. archaïsme, from Gr. archaios, ancient, from arché, beginning.] 1. An ancient or obsolete word, expression, or idiom. — 2. Antiquity of style or use; obsolescence. [Rare.]

A select vocabulary corresponding (in point of archaïsme and remoteness from ordinary use) to our Scriptural vocabulary. De Quincy.

Archomphala (ar-ko-mph'la) n. [Arch, chief, rule, dominion, and omphalos, brain.] The highest of the primary sub-classes into which Owen has subdivided the mammals in accordance with the structure of the brain distinguished by the enormous vertical and posterior development of the cerebral over the cerebellar lobes, the former completely overlapping the latter as well as the olfactory lobes. In this sub-class the number of convolutions attains its maximum, and there is a corpus callosum. It includes the solitary order, family, genus, and species, Man.

Archomyl (ar-ko-mil) n. A principal enemy, specifically, Satan, the grand adversary of mankind.

Archology (ar-ko-lo-jy) n. Same as Archology.

Archur (arch'er) n. [Fr archer, from arc, I, arcus, a bow. See ARCH.] 1. One who uses a bow, one who is skilled in the use of the bow and arrow, a Bowman. 2. The archer fish (which see).

Archurine (arch'er-in) n. A female archer. [She, therefore, glorious archurine of heaven.] Cooper

Archur-fish (arch'er-fish) n. A name given to the Tonnoies fasciatus, a conely-finned, Archer-fish (Tonnoies fasciatus).

seemingly pteropod fish, about 6 inches long, inhabiting the seas around Java, which has the faculty of shooting drops of water to the distance of 2 or 4 feet, with sure aim, at insects, thereby causing them to fall into the water, when it seizes and devours them. The soft, and even the spiny portion of their dorsal fin, are so covered with scales as to be scarcely distinguishable from the rest of their body. Called also Darter fish.

Archery (arch'ery) n. 1 The use of the bow and arrow, the practice, art, or skill of archery; the art of shooting with a bow and arrow. 2. Archers collectively.

*The monarch saw the gambols sing,
And back he took a gallant wing.
That rainbow flew, and rainbow shone,
Might serve the archery to do.* St. M. Scott

3. In old law, a service of keeping a bow for the lord's use, in the defence of his castle.

Archon Court, n. Court of Archons. The chief and most ancient consistory court, belonging to the archbishopric of Canterbury, for the debating of spiritual causes, and held in Westminster Hall. It is so called from the church in London, commonly St. Mary in Bow (de archibus), where it was formerly held. The jurisdiction of this court extends over the province of Canterbury. The chief judge is called the Dean of arches.

Archetype (ar-ko-tip) n. [Arch, chief, beginning, and typos, form.] 1. A model or first form, the original pattern or model after which a thing is made, or to which it corresponds.

In the philosophy of Locke the archetype of our ideas are the things really existing out of us. Flourens

Then it was that the House of Commons, the archetype of all the representative assemblies which now meet, either in the Old or the New World, held its first sittings. Macaulay

2. In coinage, the standard weight by which others are adjusted. 3. In comparison with that ideal, original, or fundamental pattern on which a natural group of animals or system of organs is assumed to have been constructed, as the vertebral archetype.

Archetype-shedion (ar-ko-tip-shi-on) n. In anatomy an ideal skeleton, constructed by Professor Owen, and to which the endoskeletons of all the Vertebrata are referred as modifications. In this skeleton is arranged the succession of vertebral segments of these animals, together with their various processes, foramina, and appendages.

Archetypal (ar-ko-tip'al) a. Relating to an archetype; archetypal.

Archus (ar-ko-us) n. Same as Archus.

Archigrapher (ar-ko-ig'ra-fer) n. [Arch, chief, and grapho, to write.] A chief secretary.

Archil (ar-ko-il) n. [Fr archille, archil—after Rosellus or Orientalis, who about 1200 first employed the lichen for dyeing purposes.] A rich violet, mauve, or purple colouring matter obtained from certain lichens, especially the Rosella anserina and R. fruticulosa, growing on rocks in the Canary and Cape Verde Islands. The lichen is bruised between stones and moistened with putrid urine, mixed with quicklime or other alkaline liquor. It first takes a purplish red colour, and then turns to violet. In the first state it is called archil, and in the second, laccus or litmus. Dyers rarely use archil by itself, on account of its darkness and the perishableness of its beauty. They employ it to give a bloom to other colours, as pinks, Rosella anserina, from which archil is obtained.

blue, and black, but this bloom soon decays. Archil is used for colouring the spirals of thermometers, and also by chemists as a test for detecting the presence of an acid. Written also Archil, Orchil, etc.

Archilochian (ar-ki-lô-ki-an), a. Pertaining to Archilochus, the Greek poet. In some cases the term is used to denote the four metrical combinations which he invented. There are three dactylic Archilochian distichs, and one iambic Archilochian distich.

Archilowe (arch'i-lô), n. [D Ar, again, and elow, shot or share of expenditure at an inn. Comp. Sc. lawing.] The return which one who has been treated in an inn or tavern sometimes reckons himself bound in honour to make to the company. When he calls for his bottle he is said to give his archilowe. Also written Archilagh. [Scotch.]

I propose that this good little gentleman that seems out of proportion, as I may say, in this rally, shall send for a tumbler of brandy, and I'll pay for another by way of archilowe. Sir H. Scott.

Archilute (arch'i-lut), n. Same as Archilowe.

Archimagus (ar-ki-mâ-gus), n. The high-priest of the Persian Magi, or worshippers of fire.

Archimandrite (ar-ki-man'drit), n. [From mandrita, a Syriac word for monk; Gr. mandra, a monastery.] In the Greek CA. an abbot, or abbot-general, who has the superintendence of many abbot and convents. In Sicily the abbots are called archimandrites because their convents were originally of Greek institution, and conform to the rules of St Basil. The abbots-general of the United Greeks in Poland, Galicia, Transylvania, Hungary, and Venice also bear the title.

Czech Archimandrite, from an original sketch.

Archimedeon (ar-ki-mê-dê-on), a. Pertaining to Archimedes, or to the screw invented by him. — Archimedeon propeller, a propeller consisting of a continuous spiral vane on a hollow core running lengthwise of the vessel. It is an amplification and extension of the screw. — Archimedeon screw, an instrument said to have been invented by Archimedes to raise water to a small height. It is formed by winding a flexible tube round a cylinder in the form of a screw. When the screw is placed in an inclined position, as in the accompanying wood cut, and the lower end immersed in water, by causing the screw to revolve the water is raised to the upper end. Whatever quantity of water first enters the screw immediately descends by its own weight to the lowest point of the spiral, but this point being always shifted higher up by the revolution of the screw, water or other fluid may thus be raised to a limited height. Called also Water Screw and Spiral Pump. — Archimedeon principle, or principle of Archimedes, (a) the principle of the equilibrium of the lever, namely, that a lever loaded with two weights, on opposite sides of the fulcrum, is in equilibrium when the weights are inversely proportional to the length of the arms at whose ends they hang, and that the pressure on the fulcrum of the lever is then exactly equal to the sum of the two weights. (b) The hydrostatical principle, also discovered by

Archimedes, that a body immersed in a fluid loses exactly as much of its weight as is equal to the weight of the water it dis-

Architect (ar-ki-têkt), n. [Fr. architecte, L. architectus, from Gr. arkhi, chief, and têktôn, a workman.] 1. A person skilled in the art of building; one who understands architecture, or makes it his occupation to form plans and designs of buildings, and superintend the artificers employed. — 2. Architecture (ar-ki-têk-tôr), n. [L. architectura, from architectus. See ARCHITECT.] 1. The art or science of building or constructing, workmanship; construction.

The formation of the first earth being a piece of divine architecture, ascribed to a particular providence. Burnet.

Specifically — 2. The art of constructing houses, bridges, and other buildings for the purposes of civil life — often called civil architecture, or, in a still more limited sense, the principles of fine art applied to building, that branch of the fine arts which has for its object the production of edifices pleasing to a cultivated and artistic taste, gratifying the feeling of the beautiful. The leading styles of architecture have been characterized as Egyptian, Indian, Greek, Gothic, &c. An admixture of styles, chiefly of the Classic with Gothic, gave rise in the middle ages to the Byzantine, Romanesque, and Norman, and at a later date to the Renaissance, &c. The Greek style was divided into three orders, mainly with reference to the proportions and ornamentation of its columns, named respectively the Doric, Ionic, and Corinthian; and to these the Romans added the Tuscan and Composite. Each style has various stages, indicative generally of the age or the country in which each modification took its rise. Thus the Gothic has been divided into the Norman, the Early English, Decorated, Flamboyant, &c. — Military architecture, the art of fortification. — Naval architecture, the art of building ships and other structures useful in naval warfare.

-Arc. The termination of many English words. (a) It is the adjective hard, G. hart, A. Sax. heard, as in O.H.G. proper names; as, Adelhart, very noble; Reginhart, Reinhart, E. Reynard, strong in counsel; Bernhart, E. Bernard, strong like a bear; Gotthart, E. Goddard, strong through God. (b) It appears to be a Teutonic suffix, signifying kind, sort, nature, mode of life (G. art, kind, species, nature, D. aard), and has the force of an augmentative, meaning one who naturally is, or who habitually performs, what is implied in the root; as, braggart (braggard), dotard, drunkard, dullard, sluggard, wizard. In some of these or similar words it is probably a modified form of the English noun termination -er, there being a tendency in Teutonic tongues to add a final d or t after a liquid for the sake of euphony; thus vulgar E. drownd for drown, swound for sworn, scholar for scholar, Prov. E. and Sc. misert and orphan for miser and orphan. In a few words -ard appears to have a passive force; as, loppard, pollard, a tree that is lopped, polled.

Ardeasine (Ar-dē-'sīn), n. (Fr., from ardasse; said to be from the district of Ardeshtir, in Persia.) A very fine sort of Persian silk, the finest used in the looms of France.

High in Farnassus' top her sons she show'd,
And pointed out those arduous paths they trod. Pope.

2. Attended with great labour, like the ascending of acclivities; difficult; as, an arduous employment, task, or enterprise. — Arduous, difficult, hard. Arduous, requiring extraordinary effort, energy, and perseverance to overcome, and mostly applied to a protracted undertaking; hard, requiring less endurance and energy, and more within the reach of common powers than arduous, but taxing the energies more than difficult; difficult, not easy, laborious, but attainable or to be accomplished by fair effort or application. Hard sometimes applies to passive suffering, as a hard lot; arduous and difficult do not.

It is often difficult to control our feelings; it is still harder to subdue our will; but it is an arduous undertaking to control the contending will of others.

Crash.

Arduously (Ar'dū-us-lī), adv. In an arduous manner; with laboriousness.

Arduousness (Ar'dū-us-nes), n. The state or quality of being arduous; difficulty of execution.

Ardure† (Ar'dūr), n. [L. ardor.] Burning. 'The wicked enchauffing or ardure of this sinne.' Chaucer.

Argonaut (ar-jó-nat), n. [Gr. Argo, Jason's ship, and nautes, a sailor.] 1. One of the persons who, according to the Old Greek legend, sailed to Colchis with Jason, in the ship Argo, in quest of the golden fleece.—2. One of the molluscous animals belonging to the genus Argonauta, family Argonautidae, and class Cephalopoda or cuttle-fishes, more especially the Argonauta Arpe (common argonaut, paper-nautilus, or paper-which sits in it with the respiratory tube or 'funnel' turned towards the carina or 'keel.' This famed mollusc swims only by ejecting water from its funnel, and it can crawl in a reversed position, carrying its shell over its back like a snail. The account of its floating on the surface of the sea, with its sail-shaped arms extended to catch the breeze, and with the six other arms as oars, is a mere poetic fable. The argonaut, or paper-nautilus, must be carefully distinguished from the pearly-nautilus or nautilus proper (Nautilus Pompilius), which belongs to a different division of the cuttle-fishes, namely, the tetrabranchiate or four-gilled.

Argonauta (ar-jó-ná'ta), n. A genus of cuttle-fishes to which the argonauts belong. See ARGONAUT.

Argonautic (ar-jó-ná'tík), a. Pertaining to the Argonauts, or to their voyage to Colchis; as, the Argonautic story.

Argonautides (ar-jó-ná'tí-dé), n. pl. The family of cephalopodous molluscs, order Tetrabranchiata, which contains the argonaut, paper-sailor, or paper-nautilus. See ARGONAUT.

These were words
As moved by the measure of himself
Arguing boundless forbearance. Trappena.

3. To persuade by argument or reasons.

It is a sort of poetical logic which I would make use of to argue you into a protection of this play. Congreve.

4. To accuse or charge with.

I have pleaded guilty to all expressions of mine which can be argued of obscenity. . . . and retract them. Dryden.

Arguer (ar-jó-ér), n. One who argues; a reasoner; a disputant.

Arguif (ar-jó-fí), v.t. 1. To argue.—2. To have weight, as an argument; to import; to signify. [In both uses vulgar.]

Arguif (ar-jó-fí), v.t. To argue. [Vulgar.] Argument (ar-jó-mént), n. [L. argumentum, proof, evidence, theme, subject-matter, from arguo, to argue.] 1. Proof; evidence.

There is . . . no more palpable argument of the existence of a Deity. Ray.

2. The subject of a discourse or writing; an abstract or summary of a book or section of a book.

The abstract or argument of the piece is shortly as follows. Telford.

ch, chain; sh, so, look; g, go; j, job;

2, Fr. ton; ng, sing; TS, then; th, thin;

w, wig; wh, whig; sh, sure.—See K&K.

a sitting, from ars, to sit; skr ar, to bring one thing to another.] 1. The limb of the human body which extends from the shoulder to the hand. In her, the arm is variously borne as a charge upon the shield and for crest. 2. Anything formed on the type of or resembling the arm, as fore-legs of animals, the bough of a tree, the slender parts of a machine projecting from a trunk, axle, or fulcrum, as the arms of a lever; anything projecting from a main body, as a narrow inlet of waters from the sea. — 3. Fig. power, might, strength; as, the secular arm. In this sense the word is often used in the Scriptures.

To whom is the arm of the Lord revealed? Is. xlii. 1.

— Daggering or stabbing arms, a practice once observed among gallants of piercing their arms with daggers so as to draw blood, which they mixed with wine and drank to the health of their mistresses. Nerve.

Have I not a shield'd arm, and done all the offices of protected gallantry for you sake? Marston.

ARM (arm), v.t. To take by the arm; to offer the arm to; to take up in the arm.

Arm your prize; I know you will not lose him. Boss. & Fl.

And make him with our plumes and partimes. A grave. Come, arm him. Shak.

ARM (arm), n. [Fr. arme, a weapon, from L. arma, armis.] 1. Milit. (a) a weapon: in this sense most commonly used in the plural, and when used in the singular it is for the most part rather with reference to a particular kind of weapon than with reference to an individual piece.

We are sending an army of rifles against an army of muskets, though the Russian musket is, we believe, a superior and powerful arm. Leader newspaper.

(b) pl. Armour: coverings for the body intended as defences against weapons of war.

Look, a prize! Three horses and three goodly suits of arms, And all in charge of whom? a girl, say on. Tramont.

(c) A branch of the military service, as cavalry or artillery; as, the enemy was strong in artillery, but we were weak in that arm. [This use is possibly in part due to a figurative use of the other word arm in the sense of a branch of anything.] Hence— 2. pl. Deeds or exploits of war; war; hostility.

Arms and the man I sing. Dryden.

3. pl. Armorial bearings: the device armorial of a community, office, or family, consisting of figures and colours borne on shields, on banners, &c. as marks of dignity and distinction, and, in the case of family and feudal arms, descending from father to son. Armorial bearings have been classed as—(1) Arms of dominion, or the national arms borne by the sovereign; (2) of pretension, quartered by a sovereign to express his claim to a foreign kingdom, as those of France borne by the kings of England till 1801; (3) of succession, or feudal arms, arms of a lordship or estate, as those of Mar quartered by the earls of Derby; (4) of family, borne by all the descendants of the first bearer; (5) of assumption, arms of a captive in war borne by his captor, thus the Prince of Wales bears the arms of Bohemia; (6) of alliance, as those of a wife which a husband impales with his own; (7) of office, as of corporations, &c. — Cresting arms, sometimes called allusive or passing arms, and in French armes parlantes, contain charges alluding to the name of the bearer, thus the arms of the family of Arundel are six swallows (hirundines in French) argent. Armorial bearings were first employed by the Crusaders, and became hereditary in families at the close of the twelfth century. They took their rise from the knights painting their banners each with a square or figure proper to himself, to enable him to be distinguished in battle when clad in armour. 4. In law, anything which a man takes in his hand in order to strike or assault another serves as a def. thorn, or as the legs of a stool. — Arms of slashed with not accurately pronounced calculated with great precision greater distance ceded them. 1. tin-Henry ride sion. — Small arms, arms that can be carried by those who use them. — A stand of arms, a complete set of arms for one soldier, consisting of a musket, bayonet, cartridge-box and belt, with a sword. — To be in arms, to be in a state of hostility, or of preparation for war.

ARM (arm), v.t. To provide with arms, weapons, or means of attack or resistance; to take arms; as, the nations arm for war. 'Tis time to arm. Shak.

ARMADA (ar-má'dá), n. [Sp. an armed naval force.] A fleet of armed ships; a squadron. The term is usually applied to the Spanish fleet, called the Invincible Armada, consisting of 130 ships, intended to act against England in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, A.D. 1588.

ARMADILLO (ar-má-dí'llo), n. pl. ARMADILLOS (ar-má-dí'llo). [Sp. dim. of armado, one who is armed, so called from its bony shell.] An edentate mammal peculiar to South America, of the genus Dasypus, family Dasypodidae, consisting of various species. These animals, with the allied genera Chlamyphorus and Oryzomys, form a family intermediate between the sloths and ant-eaters, and are characterized by having molar teeth only. The armadillos are covered with a hard bony shell, divided into bands composed of small separate plates like a coat of mail, flexible everywhere except on the forehead, shoulders and haunches, where it is not movable. The belts are connected by a membrane, which enables the animal to roll itself up like a hedgehog. These animals burrow in the earth, where they lie during the daytime, seldom going abroad except at night. They are of different sizes, the largest, Dasypus gigas, being 3 feet in length without the tail, and the smallest only 10 inches. They subsist chiefly on fruits and roots, sometimes on insects and flesh. When attacked they roll themselves into a ball, presenting their armour on all sides to any assailant, but they are inoffensive, and their flesh is esteemed good food. Cuvier divides the whole genus into five small groups, which are principally distinguished from each other by the number and form of their teeth and claws.

ARMADO (ar-má'dó), n. Same as ARMADA (which see). 'A whole armada of convicted sail.' Shak.

ARMAMENT (ar-ma-ment), n. [L. armamentum, utensile, tackle, from arma, arma.] 1. A body of forces equipped for war; used of a land or naval force. 'The whole united armament of Greece.' Glover.

Armistian (Ar-mil-lar-i), n. One of a sect of party of Christians, so called from James Armistead or Harbison, a Protestant divine of Leyden, Holland, who died in 1608. They were called also Armistians, from their having presented a remonstrance to the States-general in 1610. They separated from the Calvinists, objecting to their views of predestination. The Armistian doctrines are—

(1) Conditional election and reprobation, in opposition to absolute predestination. (2) Universal redemption, or that the atonement was made by Christ for all mankind, though none but believers can be partakers of the benefit. (3) That man, in order to secure true faith, must be regenerated and renewed by the operation of the Holy Spirit, which is the gift of God, but that this grace is not irrevocable and may be lost, so that men may relapse from a state of grace and die in their sins.

*The Armistians has mingling the Calvinist, the Calvinist has mingled the Armistians in a labyrinth of contradictions. The advocate of free-will appeals to conscience and instinct—in an Ar sense of what ought in equity to be. The necessitarian falls back upon the experienced reality of facts.* Frederick.

Armour (Ar-mor), n. [O E. armure, O Fr. armours, Fr. armadura, from L. armatura, armour, from arma, to arm.] 1. Defensive arms, any covering worn to protect the body in battle; also called harness. Metal armour was used from the tenth to the eighteenth century, and at first consisted of a tunic made of iron rings firmly sewn flat upon strong cloth or leather, and called mail. The rings were afterwards interlinked one with another so as to form a garment of themselves, called chain-mail. Great variety is found in the pattern of the armour, and in some cases small pieces of metal were used instead of rings, forming what is called scale-armour. Other parts, consisting of single pieces of metal, called plate-armour, were afterwards added, until the whole body came to be incased in a metal covering. The various forms of ring or scale armour were gradually superseded by the complete plate-armour, which continued to be worn until the introduction of firearms and field-artillery rendered it useless. Armour for distinguished personages was often embossed, engraved, and gilded in a costly manner. In the engraving are shown the various parts of a complete suit of plate-armour of the fifteenth century. In English statistics, armour is used for the

To come to or reach a certain point in progress either by water or land, followed by at; as, we arrived at Havre-de-Grace.—2. To reach a point or stage by progressive advance; to attain to a certain result or state, as, to arrive at an unusual degree of excellence or wickedness; to arrive at a conclusion. In this sense sometimes with to. 'The Greek language was arrived to its full perfection.' Dryden.—3. To happen or occur [Obsolete.]

He to whom this glorious death arrives. Walker.

Arrive (a-ri-v') v.i. 1. To reach. 'He has arrived the happy tale.' Milton.—2. To come to; to happen to. 'Lost a worse was arrive him.' Milton.—3. To come to arrive; to bring. 'When Fortune . . . had arrived me in the most joyful port.' G. Oronodish. Arrive (a-ri-v') n. Arrival.

How shall I joy of thy arrival to heart? Dryden.

Arroba (a-rô-ba), n. [Ar. arrob, the fourth part.] 1. A weight formerly used in Spain, Portugal, Goa, Brazil, and in all Spanish America, and still used in the greater part of Central and South America. In the states of Spanish origin its weight is generally equal to 25 lbs avoirdupois, in Brazil it equals 32 lbs.—2. A measure for wine, spirits, and oil, in Spain and Mexico equal to 34 imperial gallons for wine and spirits, and to 24 imperial gallons for oil; in Chili, Peru, and Bolivia equal to 67 imperial gallons for wine.

Arrode (a-rô-de), v.t. [L. arrode, to gnaw at—ad, to, and rode, to gnaw, whence arode, rode, etc.] To gnaw or nibble at.

Arrogance (a-rô-gan), n. From arrop, to elate or desire. The act much upon one's self which consists in exultation, estimation, the worth or importance of the person to an undue degree; pride with contempt of others, conceit, presumption.

Pride hath an other glass To show itself, but pride, for supple knees Food arrogancy, and are the proud man's foes. Shak. Assumption, haughtiness, presumption, pride, diadema, overbearing, conceit, conceitedness.

Arrogancy (a-rô-gan-si), n. Arrogance. 'Presumptuous arrogancy.' North.

Arrogant (a-rô-gant), a. 1. Making or having the disposition to make exorbitant claims of rank or estimation; giving one's self an undue degree of importance; haughty; full of assumption; applied to persons. 'Arrogant Winchester, that haughty prelate.' Shak.—2. Characterized by arrogance; proceeding from undue claims of self-importance; applied to things, as, arrogant claims.

His (Lord Clarendon's) temper was sour, arrogant, and impatient of opposition. Mackay.

—Magisterial, Dogmatic, Arrogant. See under MAGISTERIAL.—SVN. Proud, assuming, overbearing, presumptuous, haughty. Arrogantly (a-rô-gant-li), adv. In an arrogant manner, with undue pride or self-importance.

Arrogantness (a-rô-gant-ness), n. Arrogance. Bailey.

Arrogate (a-rô-gât), v.t. pret. & pp. arrogated, pp. arrogating. [L. arrogare, arrogatum—ad, to, and rogo, to beg or desire.] To claim or demand unduly or presumptuously; to claim from vanity or false pretensions; to lay claim to in an overbearing manner; as, to arrogate power or dignity to one's self. 'To arrogate the right of deciding dogmatically.' Mackay.

Who, not content With fair equality, fraternal state, Will arrogate dominion undeserved Over his brethren. Milton.

Arrogation (a-rô-gâ-shon), n. 1. The act of arrogating, or making exorbitant claims; the act of taking more than one is justly entitled to.

Where witness is extinguished all manner of arrogation must of necessity be extinct. Dr H. More.

2. In Rom. law, same as Arrogation.

Arrogative (a-rô-gât-iv), a. Assuming or making undue claims and pretensions. Dr H. More.

Arrounde, Arondie (a-ron-dé), n. [See next article.] In her applied to a crown, the arms of which are composed of sections of a circle. Written also Arondy.

Arroundissement (a-ron-dé-man), n. [Fr. from arroundir, to make round ar, from L. ad, and round, L. rotundus, round.] In France, an administrative district forming a subdivision of a department.

Arondy (a-ron-dé), n. In her same as Arrounde.

Arrope (ar-rô-pé or ar-rô-pé), n. [Sp.] Must of new wine, especially sherry, boiled to a syrup, in order to be used as a colouring matter for other wines.

Arrose (a-rô-ré), v.t. [Fr. arroser, to sprinkle.] To bedew, to sprinkle, to wet; to drizzle.

The blessed dew of heaven does arrose you. Ben Jonson.

Arrosion (a-rô-shon), n. [L. arrosio, to gnaw or nibble at.] A gnawing at. Bailey.

Arrow (ar'ô), n. [A. Sax. arow, arow, arow; same word as loal, ar, pl. arow, an arrow, and probably allied to A. Sax. arw, arw, swift, also an arrow (the swift thing), loal, ar, swift, ready, O.G. ar, a javelin.] 1. A missile weapon, straight, slender, pointed, and barbed, to be shot with a bow.—2. Anything resembling an arrow, as, (a) in sure, a small pointed iron rod, or a stick shod with iron, to stick into the ground at the end of the chain. (b) In fort, a work placed at the salient angles of a glacis, communicating with the covert way.—Broad arrow. See BROAD-ARROW.

Arrow (ar'ô), v.t. To shoot up into a long pointed stalk like an arrow.

The West Indian planters must prevent his sugar-cane from arrowing. Simmons' Colonial Mag.

Arrow-grass (ar'ô-gras), n. A common name for plants of the genus Triglochin, and order Juncaginaceae; also applied sometimes to the members of the order generally.

Arrow-head (ar'ô-hed), n. 1. The head of an arrow.—2. A genus of aquatic plants, so called from the shape of their leaves. See SAGITTARIA. 3. A name sometimes given to a blemish.

Arrow-headed (ar'ô-hed-ed), a. Shaped like the head of an arrow.—Arrow-headed characters, alphabetical characters formed by a combination of triangular or wedge-like figures; hence called also Cuneiform.

三三 三三 三三

三三 三三 三三

Arrow-headed Characters.

Characters. They are found inscribed on pottery, bricks, rocks, and monuments at Persopolis, Babylon, Nineveh, Susa, and other places of the East. The characters were deciphered by Grotefend, Rawlinson, Burnouf, and others.

Arrow-root (ar'ô-rôt), n. A starch largely used for food and for other purposes. Arrow-root proper, sometimes called Bermuda or West Indian arrow-root, is obtained from the horizontal rhizomes of several species of Maranta, and perhaps owes its name to the scales which cover the rhizome, which have some resemblance to the point of an arrow, as may be seen from the cut. Some, however, suppose that the name is due to the fact of the fresh roots being used as an application against wounds inflicted by poisoned arrows, and others say that arrow is a corruption of ara, the Indian name of the plant. The species from which arrow-root is most commonly obtained is M. arundinacea, hence called the arrow-root plant. Brazilian

a. Rhizome.

arrow-root, or tapioca meal, is got from the large fleshy root of Manihot utilisima, after the poisonous juice has been got rid of. East Indian arrow-root, from the large root-stocks of Cucurbita angurifolia; Chinese arrow-root, from the creeping rhizomes of Nelum-bium speciosum. English arrow-root, from the potato, Portland arrow-root, from the corns of Arum maculatum; and Osewego arrow-root, from Indian corn.

Arrow-shoot (ar'ô-shôn), n. A name sometimes given to a blemish (which see).

Arrow-wood (ar'ô-wôd), n. A Western American plant of the genus Viburnum, so named because the Indians dwelling between the Mississippi and the Pacific make their arrows of it.

Arrowy (ar'wō-l), a. Resembling an arrow or arrows in any quality, as shape or rapidity and directness of motion. 'Iron sleek, of arrowy shower.' Gray. 'The lambent homage of his arrowy tongue.' Cooper.

The carrion bird released
Points to one cherished spot his arrowy flight.
J. Baillie.

Arroyo (ar-ro'ō), n. [Sp.] A water-course; a rivulet. Barlett.

Arschin (ar'shin), n. See ARSHIN.

Arse (ars), n. [A. Sax. ears, ars, Icel. and Sw. ars, Dan. arts, D. aars, G. arsch.] The buttocks or hind part of an animal. — To hang an arse, a low expression signifying to lag behind; to be sluggish or tardy. Hudibras.

Arsenal (ar'se-nal), n. [Fr. arsenal, Sp. arsenal, darzens, It. arsenale, arsenale, darzens, from Ar. dar as-sinā, a house for working in.] A repository or magazine of arms and military stores, necessary either for assault or defence, whether for land or naval service; a public establishment where naval and military engines, or warlike equipments, are manufactured or stored, as at Woolwich.

Arsenate, Arseniate (ar'sen-āt, ar-sē-ni-āt), n. A salt formed by arsenic combined with any base.

Arsenic (ar'sen-ik), n. [Fr. arsenic, from L. arsenicum, Gr. arsenikon, yellow orpiment, from arsēn, arsenos, male — from its powerful qualities.] 1. A chemical element of a steel-blue colour, quite brittle. It forms alloys with most of the metals. Combined with sulphur it forms orpiment and realgar, which are the yellow and red sulphides of arsenic. Orpiment is the true arsenicum of the ancients. With oxygen arsenic forms two compounds, the more important of which is arsenious oxide or arsenic trioxide (As_2O_3), which is the white arsenic, or simply arsenic, of the shops. It is usually seen in white, glassy, translucent masses, in which state it is obtained by the process of sublimation from several ores, particularly that of cobalt, and from arsenical pyrites. Of all substances arsenic is that which has most frequently occasioned death by poisoning, both by accident and design. The best remedies against the effects of arsenic on the stomach are hydrated sesquioxide of iron or gelatinous hydrate of magnesia, or a mixture of both, with copious draughts of bland liquids of a mucilaginous consistence, which serve to procure its complete ejection from the stomach. Like many other virulent poisons it is a safe and useful medicine, especially in skin diseases, when judiciously employed. It is used as a flux for glass, and also for forming pigments. It is illegal to retail arsenic without marking the word 'Poison' on the envelope and entering the purchaser's name in a book. — 2. The popular name of arsenious oxide, the preparation of arsenic usually retailed in the shops. See above.

Arsenical (ar-sen'ik), a. Containing arsenic; specifically, containing arsenic in smaller proportion than arsenious compounds. — Arsenical acid (H_2AsO_4), an acid formed from arsenic oxide. — Arsenical oxide (As_2O_3), a compound of oxygen and arsenic having a larger proportion of oxygen than arsenious oxide: often improperly called Arsenic Acid.

Arsenical (ar-sen'ik-al), a. Of or pertaining to arsenic; containing arsenic. — Arsenical minerals, a family or class of minerals in which arsenic acts the part of the electro-negative element. They occur in primitive districts in metalliferous veins, usually associated with metallic sulphides. — Arsenical silver, an ore of silver containing arsenic.

Arsenicate (ar-sen'ik-āt), v. t. To combine with arsenic.

Arsenide (ar-sen-id), n. A compound of arsenic and a metallic base.

Arsenious (ar-sē-ni-us), a. Pertaining to or containing arsenic. — Arsenious acid ($HAsO_3$), an acid formed from arsenious oxide. — Arsenious oxide (As_2O_3), a compound of oxygen and arsenic having a smaller proportion of oxygen than arsenic oxide. Also called White Arsenic, and often improperly Arsenious Acid. See under ARSENIC.

Arsenite (ar-sen-it), n. A salt formed by the union of arsenious oxide with a base.

Arseniuret, Arsenuret (ar-sen'ū-ret), n.

A combination of arsenic with a metallic or other base. The arseniurets of cobalt, nickel, and iron are found both in veins and in beds.

Arseniuretted (ar-sen'ū-ret-ed), a. Combined with arsenic so as to form an arseniuret. — Arseniuretted hydrogen (AsH_3), a gas generated by fusing arsenic with its own weight of granulated zinc, and decomposing the alloy with strong hydrochloric acid. It is colourless, has a fetid odour like that of garlic, and is frightfully poisonous when breathed.

Arsenous (ar'sen-us), a. Same as Arsenious.

Arse-smart (ar'smārt), n. A plant, Polygonum Hydropiper. Called also Smart-weed (which see).

Arseversy, Arse-versie (ar'se-vēr-si), adv. [Probably a corruption of Fr. d'averse, d'avers.] Reverse or turned backwards; placed preposterously; upside down; topsyturvy. 'The world goes arse-versie.' The Passenger of Benvenuto.

Arsin, Arsine (ar'sin), n. A Russian measure of 2 feet 4 242 inches.

Arsis (ar'sis), n. [Gr. arsis, from arō, to elevate.] 1. In gram. the elevation of the voice, in distinction from thesis, or its depression. — 2. In pros. that syllable in a measure where the ictus is put, or which is marked by a greater stress or force. — Arsis and thesis, in music, the strong position and weak position of the bar, indicated by the down-beat and up-beat in marking time.

Arsmetrike, n. Arithmetic. Chaucer.

Arson (ar'son), n. [O Fr. arson, from L. ardeo, arsum, to burn.] In law, the malicious burning of a dwelling-house or out-house of another man, which by the common law is felony, and which, if any person is therein, is capital. Also, the wilful setting fire to any church, chapel, warehouse, mill, barn, agricultural produce, ship, coal-mine, and the like. In Scotland it is called wilful fire-raising, and in both England and Scotland it is a considerable aggravation if the burning is to defraud insurers.

Art (art), n. The second person singular indicative mood, present tense, of the verb to be. See AM, ARE.

Art (art), n. [L. ars, artis, art, from same root as Gr. arō, to join, to fit.] 1. The artificial disposition or modification of things to answer some special purpose; the application of knowledge or power to effect a purpose; the employment of means to accomplish some desired end: in this sense art stands opposed to nature. 'Blest with each grace of nature and of art.' Pope.

Mr. Mill says, 'Art is but the employment of the powers of nature for an end.' Yes; but the employment is the art. That use or employment of the natural elements is precisely the function of the intelligence and the will, which differs from nature, in its proper sense, as the active differs from the passive. Edin. Rev.

2. A system of rules serving to facilitate the performance of certain actions; knowledge of such rules or skill in applying them, as in any trade, handicraft, or other special subject; as, the art of building; the art of engraving; the fine arts: in this sense art is opposed to science.

Theorists, by an observation of particulars and by generalizing on them, attempt to construct a system of scientific propositions with respect to a certain subject; upon which system a set of rules intended for the guidance of practice may be founded. These rules form an art. Sir G. C. Lewis.

It is in this sense that we speak of the useful or mechanical arts, that is, those in which the hands and body are more concerned than the mind, as in making clothes and utensils; the fine arts (see under FINE); and the liberal, polite, or elegant arts, in which category may be classed all the branches of academical learning, as well as fine art. Formerly the circle of the sciences was confined to the seven liberal arts — grammar, rhetoric, logic, arithmetic, music, geometry, and astronomy. In this sense the term arts is still employed when we speak of the arts classes in the universities, a master of arts, &c.

In America, literature and the elegant arts must grow up side by side with the coarser plants of daily necessity. W. Irving.

3. (a) One of the fine arts, more especially one of the imitative members of the group, and in particular painting or sculpture; as, he has adopted art as his profession.

'Who are the critics?' 'Men who have failed in literature and art.' Disraeli.

(b) The special skill required by those who practise these arts; artistic faculty; skill in counterfeiting nature or natural expression.

Nothing is better founded than the famous aphorism of rhetoricians, that the perfection of art consists in concealing art. Campbell.

4. Skill, dexterity, or the power of performing certain actions acquired by experience, study, or observation; knack. 'There is art in roasting eggs.' Old adage. — 5. Artfulness; cunning. 'More matter with less art.' Shak. — Art, Science. Art differs from science in being practical, while the latter is theoretical or speculative. Art in this sense is based on rules deduced from experience and designed to facilitate work or give superior excellence or precision to it. The rules of art partake less or more of the nature of directions. They are, however, ultimately based on principles; thus, the art of building is based on the principles or laws of mechanics. Science concerns itself with what is true without any necessary regard to its utility. It is knowledge coordinated, arranged, and systematized, and is based on or consists of laws discovered by observation, comparison, abstraction, and generalization.

The fundamental conception of the occupation of the architect embraces the two ideas of science and art. Architecture as an art is the work of the skilled hand; as a science, it is that of the informed and cultivated brain. Edin. Rev.

Syn. Aptitude, readiness, skill, dexterity, adroitness, contrivance, profession, business, trade, calling, cunning, artifice, deceit, duplicity.

Art (art), n. In Scots law, instigation; abetment: used now only in the phrase art and part.

By art is understood the mandate, instigation, or advice that may have been given towards committing the crime; part expresses the share that one takes to himself in it by the aid or assistance which he gives the criminal in the execution of it. Erskine.

Arte, v. t. [L. artus for arctus, confined, narrow, from arceo, to shut in.] To force; to compel; to constrain.

Love arted me to do my observance
To his estate. Chaucer.

Arted (ar'ted), a. Skilled.

It hath been counted ill for great ones to sing, or play, like an arted musician. Sylvestre, Du Barlais.

Artelries, pl. Artillery. Chaucer.

Artemis (ar-tē-mis), n. 1. In Grecian myth. the goddess of the moon and of hunting; called by the Romans Diana. See DIANA. — 2. A genus of lamellibranchiate molluscs, family Veneridae, order Siphonida, with pallial margin sinuous.

Artemisia (ar-tē-mis-i-a), n. [Gr. artemisia, wormwood.] A genus of plants of numerous species, nat. order Compositæ, comprising mugwort, southern-wood, and wormwood. Of these the A. Absinthium, or common wormwood of our cottage gardens, is well known. Several of the species are used as remedies for worms. Certain alpine species are the flavouring ingredient in the favourite French liqueur, absinthe.

Arteriac (ar-tēr-i-ak), a. Same as Arterial. Arterial (ar-tēr-i-ak), n. [Gr. arteria, the windpipe.] A medicine prescribed in diseases of the windpipe. Dunglison.

Arterial (ar-tēr-i-al), a. [See ARTERY.]

1. Pertaining to an artery or the arteries; as, arterial action. — 2. Contained in an artery; as, arterial blood. Arterial blood differs from venous blood, particularly by its lighter florid red colour and its greater warmth and coagulability — changes produced by the process of respiration. — Arterial navigation, navigation by means of rivers, deepened streams, canals, and artificial water-courses.

Arterialization (ar-tēr-i-al-iz-ā'shon), n. The process of making arterial; the conversion of the venous into the arterial blood during its passage through the lungs, by the evolution of carbonic acid, and the absorption of oxygen from the air; hæmatosis.

Arterialize (ar-tēr-i-al-iz), v. t. pret & pp. arterialized; ppr. arterializing. To communicate, as to venous blood, the qualities of arterial blood.

Arteriography (ar-tēr-i-og'ra-fī), n. [Gr. arteria, artery, and graphō, to write.] A description of the arterial system.

Arteriology (ar-tēr-i-ol'ō-jī), n. [Gr. arteria, artery, and logos, discourse.] A treatise or discourse on the arteries.

Arteriotomy (ar-tēr-i-ot'ō-mī), n. [Gr. arteria, an artery, and tomē, a cutting.] In anat. (a) the opening of an artery by the lancet or other instrument, for the purpose of letting blood. (b) That part of anatomy which treats of the dissection of the arteries.

Arteritis (Ar-te-rī'tis), n. [Gr. arteria, artery, and term. itis, denoting inflammation.] Inflammation of an artery or arteries.

Artery (Ar'tēr-ī), n. [L. arteria, from Gr. arteria, the windpipe; the term was afterwards applied to the arteries proper, which, since they were commonly found void of blood after death, were supposed to be air-ducts, and to inclose the vital spirit.] 1 † The trachea or windpipe.

Under the artery or windpipe is the mouth of the stomach.

Holland.

2 One of a system of cylindrical vessels or tubes, membranous, elastic, and pulsatile, which convey the blood from the heart to all parts of the body, by ramifications which as they proceed diminish in size and increase in number, and terminate in minute capillaries uniting the ends of the arteries with the beginnings of the veins. There are two principal arteries: the aorta, which rises from the left ventricle and ramifies through the whole body; and the pulmonary artery, which conveys venous blood from the right ventricle to the lungs, to undergo respiration. An artery is composed of three coats: the outer consists of condensed cellular membrane, and is supplied with numerous blood-vessels and nerves; the middle coat consists of circular fibres, generally supposed to be muscular; the inner coat, thin, smooth, and dense, confines the blood within its canal, and facilitates its motion.

Artesian (Ar-tē'zi-an), a. [Fr. artésien, properly pertaining to Artois in France, also term descriptive of a particular kind of well.] 1. Of or belonging to Artois in France.—2 Term descriptive of a particular kind of well, believed to have been first used in Artois. An artesian well is a perpendicular boring into the ground through which water rises to the surface of the soil, producing a constant flow or stream. Artesian wells are generally sunk in plains and districts where the lower pervious strata are bent into basin-shaped curves. The rain falling on the outcrops of these saturates the whole porous bed, so that when the bore reaches it the water by hydraulic pressure rushes up towards the level of the highest portion of the stratum. Such wells are commonly of great depth, that at Grenelle, Paris, being 1800 feet deep, while another at Rochefort is 2765 feet.

Artful (Ar'tful), a. [See ART.] 1. † Performed with or characterized by art or skill. 'Our poems with artful terms inscribed.' Milton.—2. † Artificial, as opposed to natural. 'Too artful a writer.' Dryden.—3. Cunning; practising art or stratagem; crafty; characterized by or proceeding from art or craft. 'The artful Dodger.' Dickens. 'Artful in speech, in action, and in mind.' Pope.—Cunning, Artful, Sly. See under CUNNING.

Artful (Ar'tful), adv. In an artful manner; with art or cunning; skilfully; dexterously.

Artfulness (Ar'tful-ness), n. The quality of being artful; art; craft; cunning; address.

Arthen (Ar'them), a. An old form of Arthen. 'An arthen pot.' Holland.

Arthritic, Arthritical (Ar-thrī'tik, Ar-thrī'tik-al), a. Pertaining to the joints, or to the gout; affecting the joints.

Arthritis (Ar-thrī'tis), n. [Gr., from arthron, a joint, and itis, a term denoting inflammation.] Any painful disease of the joints; any inflammation of the joints, but more particularly the gout.

Arthrodia (Ar-thrō'di-a), n. [Gr. arthrodia, from arthrōdēs, well articulated, from arthron, a joint.] A species of articulation, in which the head of one bone is received into a shallow socket in another, as is the case with the articulation of the humerus and the scapula; a kind of ball-and-socket joint.

Arthrodial, Arthrodic (Ar-thrō'di-al, Ar-thrō'dik), a. Pertaining to that form of joint called an arthrodia, a kind of ball-and-socket joint.

Arthrodynia (Ar-thrō'din'ī-a), n. [Gr. arthron, a joint, and odynē, pain.] Pain in the joints.

Arthrodynic (Ar-thrō'din'ik), a. Relating to arthrodynia, or pain in the joints.

Arthrogastra (Ar-thrō-gas'tra), n. pl. [Gr. arthron, a joint, and gaster, the belly.] A name sometimes given to those members of the Arachnida which agree in having the abdomen more or less segmented, and not separated by any line of division from the cephalothorax, including the true scorpions, book-scorpions, &c.

Arthrology (Ar-thrō'lo-jī), n. [Gr. arthron, a joint, and logos, discourse.] The knowledge of the joints.

Arthropoda (Ar-thrō'pō-da), n. pl. [Gr. arthron, a joint, and pous, podes, a foot.] One of the two primary divisions (Anarthropoda being the other) into which modern naturalists have divided the sub-kingdom Annulosa, characterized by a body composed of a series of segments arranged about a longitudinal axis, each segment occasionally and some always being provided with articulated appendages.

Arthrosis (Ar-thrō'si-a), n. [Gr. arthron, a joint.] Severely painful inflammation, mostly confined to the joints, but occasionally extending to the surrounding muscles; arthritis.

Arthrosis (Ar-thrō'sis), n. [Gr. arthron, a joint.] In anat. articulation.

Artichoke (Ar'ti-chōk), n. [Fr. artichaut, G. artichoke, artichocks, from It. articocho, said to be from Ar. ardī shauki, earth-thorn, but the existence of such an Arabic word seems doubtful. Marcel Devic, in Supplement to Littré's Dictionary, derives it from Gr. artyktos, fit for seasoning, artyō, to dress meat, to season.] The Cynara Scolymus, a plant of the nat. order Compositæ, somewhat resembling a thistle, with large divided prickly leaves. The erect flower-stem terminates in a large round head of numerous imbricated oval spiny scales which surround the flowers. The fleshy bases of the scales with the large receptacle are the parts that are eaten. Artichokes were introduced into England early in the sixteenth century. The Jerusalem artichoke, or Helianthus tuberosus, is a species of sunflower, whose roots are used like potatoes. See JERUSALEM ARTICHOKE.

Article (Ar'ti-kl), n. [L. articulus, a joint, a division, part, or member, a point or moment of time, a dim. of artus, a joint, allied to Gr. arthron, a joint, from arō, to fit.] 1. A single clause, item, point, or particular, as in a contract, treaty, or other formal agreement between parties; a distinct proposition or statement in a connected series of such; one of the particulars composing a system; a separate charge or item in an account; a condition or stipulation in a contract or bargain; a point of faith, doctrine, or duty; as, to object to an article in a protocol; to sign articles of agreement; an account consisting of many different articles; this was one of the articles of his belief. 'Upon each article of human duty.' Paley.—2. A complete and independent, or partially independent, portion of a literary publication, especially of a newspaper, magazine, review, or other periodical; as, he wrote three articles for the Edinburgh Review, and a series of articles for the Times; he always writes the leading articles in his paper.—3. A particular commodity or substance; as, an article of merchandise; salt is a necessary article: in common usage this word is applied to almost every separate substance or material.—4. † Precise point of time; moment. 'An infirm building just in the article of falling.' Wollaston.

This fatal news coming to Hicks's Hall upon the article of my Lord Russell's trial was said to have had no little influence on the jury and all the bench to his prejudice.

Everlyn.

—In the article of death [L. in articulo mortis], lit. in the moment of death; in the last struggle or agony.—5. In bot. the name formerly given to that part of a stalk or stem which is between two joints.—6. In gram. a part of speech used before nouns to limit or define their application. In the English language a or an is the indefinite article, and the the definite article. See A, AN, THE.—Articles of war, the code of regulations for the better government and discipline of the army and navy, embodied in the Mutiny Act, which is passed each year.—The Six Articles, articles imposed by a statute (often called the Bloody Statute) passed in 1541, the thirty-third year of the reign of Henry VIII. They decreed the acknowledgment of transubstantiation, the sufficiency of communion in one kind, the obligation of vows of chastity, the propriety of private masses, celibacy of the clergy, and auricular confession. Acceptance of these doctrines was made obligatory on all persons under the severest penalties; the act, however, was relaxed in 1544, and repealed in 1549.—The Thirty-nine Articles, a statement of the particular points of doctrine, thirty-nine in number, maintained by the English Church, first promulgated by a convocation held in London in 1562-63, and confirmed by royal authority, founded on and superseding an older code issued in the reign of Edward VI. They were adopted by the Irish Episcopal Church in 1686, and by the Scottish in the end of the eighteenth century.—Articles of the peace, an obligation imposed on an individual against whom some one has exhibited a complaint that he has just cause to fear that the other party will burn his house, do him some bodily harm, or procure a third person to do it, to keep the peace for a certain time, under a penalty and with or without sureties.—Lords of the articles. See under LORD.

It is used in medicine as an antispasmodic, and is useful in cases of flatulency, in hysterical paroxysms, and other nervous affections. An inferior sort is the product of certain species of Ferula.]

Aspidula (as-a-dul'a), n. [So called in honour of Aspidula Gray, who wrote a treatise on the Melanthaceae of America.] A genus of plants belonging to the nat. order Melanthaceae or colchicaceae, including but a single species (A. affinis). This plant is bulbous, with long, linear, grass-like leaves, and a long bractless cluster of flowers. From its seeds (called Cobedilla seeds) is obtained the alkaline poison called veratrine, which has been employed in rheumatic and neuralgic affections.

Aspidula (as-a-dul'a), n. [Or Aspidula obscure.] A genus of very minute, parasitic ichneumon flies which prey on, and keep in check, the aphides, so destructive to our crops and fruits. The female punctures the wingless female aphides with her ovipositor, and lays an egg in each, these hatch, become maggots, and eat out the inside of the aphid.

Aspidula (as-a-dul'a), n. [Or Aspidula obscure.] A genus of trilobites, characteristic of the lower palaeozoic rocks, so called from their true nature having been long obscure.

Aspidula (as-a-dul'a), n. [A corruption of Aspidula and Aspidula, two plants which were confounded.] A small hardy plant, nat. order Aristolochiaceae, and botanically called Aspidula europaea. Its leaves are acrid, bitter, and nauseous, and its root is extremely acrid. Both the leaves and root were formerly used as an emetic. The French call it aspidula or public-house plant, because it was formerly used to relieve the stomachs of those who had been drinking too heavily. It entered into the composition of medicated snuffs recommended in cases of headache.

Aspidula, Aspidula (as-a-dul'a), n. (C₁₀H₁₆O₄) A volatile solid obtained from Aspidula europaea. It has a remarkable tendency to crystallize in beautifully defined forms, and also to pass into the amorphous condition, from which it may be again brought into the crystalline state. It has an aromatic taste and smell like those of camphor. Called also Aspidula.

Aspidula (as-a-dul'a), n. Same as Aspidula.

Aspidula (as-a-dul'a), n. (Or Aspidula, Aspidula) A genus of plants, nat. order Aristolochiaceae, distinguished by its bell-shaped, three-lobed perianth, twelve stamens inserted at the base of the style, and with the connective of the anthers prolonged into an awl-shaped process. The fruit is a six-angled capsule, surmounted by the persistent limb of the calyx. The species are dispersed over Europe and the temperate parts of Asia and North America. A. europaea is Aspidula. See ASPIDULA.

Ascidia (as-sid'i-a), n. pl. [Gr. askidia, a little bottle, from askos, a leathern bag, a bottle.] A name given to the Tunicata or 'sea-squirrels,' molluscan animals of a low grade. They are found at low-water mark on the sea-beach, and are dredged from deep water attached to stones, shells, and fixed objects. An ascidian presents externally the appearance of a wine-jar or double-necked bottle, the one aperture of the bottle corresponding to the mouth, and the other to the vent or excretory aperture. A feature in the organization of these animals is that a large proportion of the tough outer case or test is composed of cellulose, a starchy substance highly characteristic of plants. The mouth-opening leads into a large branchial or breathing sac; and from the bottom of this sac the digestive system, consisting of stomach and intestine, is continued, the intestine opening into a second sac, the atrial chamber. This latter cavity opens externally by the second aperture of the body, and also emits the effete water which has been used in breathing. A single nervous mass or ganglion represents the nervous system, this mass being placed between the two apertures of the body. Male and female reproductive organs exist in each ascidian. The ascidians pass through peculiar phases of development, the young appearing like a tadpole body. These animals may be single or simple, social or compound. In social ascidians the peduncles of a number of individuals are united into a common tubular stem, with a partial common circulation of blood. The species are more or less gelatinous, and some are used as food in China and on the shores of the Mediterranean.

Ascididae (as-sid'i-a-dē), n. pl. [Ascidia (which see), and Gr. eidōs, resemblance.] One of the five families of mollusoids into which Mr. Woodward has divided the class Tunicata, and comprising the simple ascidians.

G. eisōn, to ask, inquire; allied to Lith. jeizkan, to seek. The vulgar English ax is no mere modern corruption, but the descendant of a form existing in A. Sax., in which such a transposition of letters was very common.] 1. To request; to seek to obtain by words; to petition; with of, in the sense of from, before the person to whom the request is made.

Ask counsel of God. Judg. xviii. 5.

2. To require, expect, or claim; as, what price do you ask?

Ask me never so much dowry. Gen. xxiv. 12.

3. To require as necessary or useful; to demand; to exact.

Asp, Aspic (asp, aspik), n. [Fr. and Gr. aspie, from L. and Gr. aspie, an asp.] 1. A species of viper (Vipera haje) found in Egypt, resembling the cobra-da-capello or spectacle-serpent of the East Indies, except that the neck of the asp is not so capable of expansion. Its colour is greenish, mingled with brown. It is found in the vicinity of the Nile, and has been celebrated for ages on account of the quick and easy death resulting from its bite. The figure of this reptile is often found carved on the portals of the temples of the ancient Egyptians, who regarded it as an emblem of the protecting genius of the world. It is represented with its head erect, in an attitude to repel aggression.

2. A species of viper found all over the continent of Europe (Vipera aspis).

Asp, from ancient Egyptian monument.

Asp (asp), n. See ASPER.
Aspalathus (as-pal'a-thus), n. [Gr. aspalathos.] 1. A thorny shrub of uncertain species.

I gave a sweet smell like cinnamon and aspalathos, and I yielded a pleasant odour like the best myrrh. Eccles. xiv. 15.

2. The African broom, a large genus of African plants, nat. order Leguminosae, with small head-like leaves and generally yellow flowers.

Asparagin, Asparagine (as-pa-ra-jin), n. [C₄H₈N₂O₃.] A crystallized substance discovered in the juice of asparagus, potato, lettuce, chestnut, marsh-mallow, &c., sometimes called Althein or Asparamid. It is an aspartate of ammonia, in which two equivalents of the hydrogen of the ammonia and one equivalent of the oxygen of the acid have left the salt and combined to form water.

Asparaginous (as-pa-ra-jin-us), a. Belonging to asparagus; resembling asparagus; specifically, having tender edible shoots like those of asparagus; as, asparaginous plants.

Asparagus (as-pa-ra-gus), n. [Gr. asparagos.] A genus of plants, nat. order Liliaceae; asparagus; sperage; vulgarly, sparrow-grass. That which is cultivated in gardens, the common asparagus, or Asparagus officinalis, has a much-branched stem rising from thick and matted perennial root-stocks, and small greenish-yellow flowers on jointed stalks. The narrow thread-like leaves are really branchlets growing in clusters in the axils of the true but scale-like leaves. Prussian or French asparagus of the Bath market is the fleshy spike of Ornithogalum pyrenaicum. The roots have a bitterish mucilaginous taste; and the stalk is, in some degree, aperient and deobstruent, but not very efficacious. The part eaten is the turlo, or young shoot covered with scales in place of leaves. The sprouts contain the crystalline substance called asparagin.

Asparamid (as-par'a-mid), n. Asparagin (which see).

Aspartate (as-pār'tāt), n. Any salt of aspartic acid.

Aspartic (as-pār'tik), a. Pertaining to or obtained from asparagin.—Aspartic acid (C₄H₈NO₃), a crystalline acid derived from asparagin.

Aspasia (as-pā'shi-a), n. [Gr. aspasomai, to embrace.] A genus of elegant epiphyllal plants, nat. order Orchidaceae, with the aspect of Epidendrum; natives of South America. The flowers are violet mottled with purple; those of A. variopictum are deliciously sweet in the morning.

Aspe, Asper, n. A species of poplar. See ASPER.

Aspect (as'pekt), n. [L. aspectus, from aspicio, to look on—ad, to, and specio, to see or look.] 1. Look; view; appearance to the eye or the mind; as, to present an object or a subject in its true aspect, under a double aspect, or in a favourable aspect. 'The aspect of a world lying in rubbish.' Bp. Burnet.—2. Countenance; look or particular appearance of the face; mien; air; as, a mild or severe aspect. 'With aspect open shall erect his head.' Pope.—3. Act of seeing; view; sight; gaze. 'His aspect was bent on the ground.' Sir W. Scott. [Rare.]—4. View commanded; prospect; outlook.

Asquint (a-skwint'), adv. [Prefix a, and equint.] To the corner or angle of the eye; obliquely; toward one side; not in the straight line of vision. 'Who look asquint or shut their eyes?' Swift.

Ass (as), n. [A. Sax. assa, a male ass, asse, the female, also esol, asat; Goth. asilus, O. Sax. esel, D. ezel, G. esel, Icel. asni, asna, Dan. asen, Lith. asilas, Rus. osels, Gael. asal, W. asyn, L. asinus (whence Fr. âne)—assa.] How far borrowing has taken place between the different languages is doubtful. 1. A solid-ungulate quadruped of the family Equidæ, the Equus asinus. This animal has long ears, a short mane, and a tail covered with long hairs at the end. It is usually of an ash colour, with a black cross over the shoulders, formed by a longitudinal and a transverse dark streak. The tame or domestic ass is patient, and carries a heavy burden. It is slow, but very sure-footed, and for this reason very useful on rough, steep, and hilly ground. The ass is supposed to be a native of Central Asia, where vast troops roam over the great deserts in a wild state. The wild ass is a fine fleet animal, and is accounted the noblest game in Persia, where its flesh is prized as venison is with us. In the East and in Spain and elsewhere the domesticated ass is a much finer animal than ours. In our own and other countries, however, the ass has become the type of obstinacy and stupidity. Hence—2. A dull, heavy, stupid fellow; a dolt; a fool; a blockhead.

Ass, Aise (ā, ās), n. Ashea. [Scotch.] Assacon (as'-sa-kon), n. The Brazilian name for the Hura brasiliensis (Martius), a euphorbiaceous tree, the bark and sap of which contain a very poisonous acrid principle. The natives prepare from them a poisonous drink, against which no antidote is known. The decoction of the bark is used as a remedy for elephantiasis.

Assafetida, n. Same as Asafetida.

Assagai (as'-sa-gā), n. [Sp. azagaya, Ar. al-khazegah.] An instrument of warfare among the Kaffirs; a throwing spear; a species of javelin. Written also Assagai.

Assai (as-sā'), [It. assai, Fr. assez, enough—L. ad, to, and satis, enough.] A term in music denoting increase; thus, added to a word signifying slow it denotes much slower, and to a word signifying quick it denotes much quicker; as, allegro, quick, allegro assai, much quicker, or very quick.

Assai (as-sā'), n. A favourite beverage in South America, made from the fruit of the Euterpe edulis or assai palm. See EUTERPE.

Assail (as-sā'il), v.t. [Fr. assaillir, from L. assilio, to leap or rush upon—ad, to, and silio, to leap, to rise.] 1. To fall upon with violence; to assault; to attack.

With greedy force he gan the fort 't assail. Spenser.

2. To attack with what bears upon the mind or feelings, as with arguments, censure, abuse, criticism, appeals, entreaties, or the like.

The prince next assailed the baron on the subject of settling his estate on his daughter. Sir W. Scott.

They assailed him with keen invective; they assailed him with still keener irony; but they found that neither invective nor irony could move him to anything but an enforced smile and a good-humoured curse. Macaulay.

—Assail, Assault, Invade. Assail, lit. to leap upon, to attack vehemently, suddenly, and unexpectedly; assault, stronger than assail, often used of attacking the person with violence, and not so frequently employed as the latter word to signify attacking by non-physical means; invade, to enter by force or encroach upon what belongs to another; especially, to enter upon the territory of another nation with the purpose of making war.—SVN. To assault, invade, attack, fall upon, set upon.

Assailable (as-sā'il-a-bl), a. Capable of being assailed, attacked, or invaded.

Assailant (as-sā'il-ant), n. One who assails, attacks, or assaults.

Assailing (as-sā'il-ant), a. 1. Assaulting; attacking; invading with violence. Milton.—2. In her. applied to various beasts borne in coat armour, when placed rather bendwise than mounted upright. Called also Assaultant and Salient.

Assailer (as-sā'il-ēr), n. One who assails.

Assailment (as-sā'il-ment), n. Attack of illness. [Rare.]

His most frequent assailment was the headache. Johnson.

Assamese (as-sam-ēs'), a. Pertaining to Assam or its inhabitants.

Assamese (as-sam-ēs'), n. A native or inhabitant, or natives or inhabitants of Assam.

Assapan, Assapanic (as-sa-pan', as-sa-pan'-ik), n. [N. American Indian name.] One of the species of flying-squirrels (Pteromys volucella).

Assart (as-sārt'), n. [O. Fr. essart, a cleared space in a wood; essarter, to clear the land of bushes, to grub up—L. ex, from, and sario, sartum, to hoe, to weed.] 1. In old law, the offence of grubbing up trees, and thus destroying thickets or coverts in a forest.—2. A tree grubbed up by the roots.—3. A piece of land cleared, as by grubbing.

Assart† (as-sārt'), v.t. To grub up trees; to commit an assart.

Assassin (as-sar'sin), n. [From Ar. hashish, a maddening drink made from hemp. Hashishin was hence the name given to those who under the influence of this drug were wont to execute the savage orders of their chiefs or sheikhs. (See below.) The word was carried to Europe by the Crusaders.] 1. One of a military and religious order in Syria, founded by Hassan-ben-Sabbah about the year 1090 in Persia, whence a colony migrated and settled on the mountains of Lebanon, and became remarkable for their assassinations in blind obedience to the will of their chief. Their religion was a compound of Magianism, Judaism, and Christianity. One article of their creed was, that the Holy Spirit resided in their chief, and that his orders proceeded from God himself. He was called Sheik, and is better known by the denomination of old man of the mountain. These barbarous chieftains and their followers spread terror among nations far and near for almost two centuries. In the time of the Crusades they mustered to the number of 50,000, and presented a formidable obstacle to the arms of the Christians. They were eventually crushed by the Sultan Bibars. Hence—2. One who kills or attempts to kill by surprise or secret assault. The circumstance of surprise or secrecy seems essential to the strict signification of this word as now used, though it is sometimes applied to one who takes any advantage in killing or attempting to murder, as by attacking one when unarmed.

Assassin† (as-sar'sin), v.t. To murder; to assassinate. With him that assassins his parents. Stillingfleet.

Assassinate† (as-sar'sin-a-sin), n. The act of assassinating. Hammond.

Help, neighbours, my house is broken open . . . and I am ravished and like to be assassinated. Dryden.

2.† To assault; to maltreat. [This usage is borrowed from Fr. assassiner or It. assassinare.]

Such usage as your honourable lords Afford me, assassinated and betrayed. Milton.

Assassinate† (as-sar'sin-it), v.t. To commit murder by assassination. 'Where now no thieves assassinate.' Sandys.

Assassinate† (as-sar'sin-it), n. [Fr. assassina†.] 1. An assassin.

Seize him for one of the assassinates. Dryden.

2. Assassination. 'Assassinates and popular insurrections.' Pope.

Assassination (as-sar'sin-á'shon), n. The act of assassinating, that is of killing or murdering by surprise or secret assault; murder by violence.

Assassinator (as-sar'sin-át-ér), n. An assassin (which see). 'The assassinator of kings.' Bates.

Assassin-like (as-sar'sin-lik), a. Like an assassin. Milton.

Assassinous† (as-sar'sin-us), a. Treacherous. 'To smother them in the basest and most assassinous manner.' Milton.

Assation† (as-sá'shon), n. [Fr. assation, L.L. assatio, from L. assatus, perf. p. of assio, to roast.] A roasting.

Assation is a concoction of the inward moisture by heat. Burton.

Assault (as-sált), n. [O.Fr. assault (Fr. assaut), from L.L. assaultus, from L. ad, to, and salvus, a leap, from salio, to leap. Assail, insult, result, &c., are from the same stem.] 1. An attack or violent onset with physical means; an onslaught; specifically, a sudden and vigorous attack on a fortified post; a storm.

Able to resist Satan's assaults and quench his fiery darts. Milton.

After some days' siege he resolved to try the fortune of an assault. Bacon.

2. An attack in which physical force is not resorted to, as by means of legislative measures or other proceedings, or by means that bear upon the mind or feelings, as by arguments, invective, appeals, &c.; as, an assault upon the prerogatives of a prince, or upon a constitution of government.

Her spirit had been invincible against all assaults of affection. Shak.

3. In law, an unlawful setting upon one's person; an attempt or offer to beat another, without touching his person; as, by lifting the fist or a cane in a threatening manner. If the blow aimed takes effect it is a battery. In Scotland there is no division, as in England, into assault and battery. Assaults are variously punished.—SYN. Attack, onset, onslaught, aggression, storm, charge.

Assault (as-sált), v.t. 1. To attack with physical means; to fall upon by violence or with a hostile intention; as, to assault a man, a house, or town.—2. To attack without physical means; to fall on with force; to assail.

The cries of babes new-born Assault his ears. Dryden.

—Assail, Assault, Invade. See under ASSAIL.—SYN. To attack, assail, invade, storm, charge.

Assailable (as-sált'a-bl), a. Capable of being assaulted.

The 26th day of October the walls were made low, and the town assailable. Hall.

Assailant (as-sált'ant), a. See ASSAILANT.

Assault-at-arms (as-sált'et-ármz), n. A name sometimes given to an exhibition of fencing or similar military exercises.

Assaulter (as-sált'ér), n. One who assaults or violently attacks.

Assay, v. [Fr.] Assault. Chaucer. Assay (as-sá), n. [O.Fr. assai, essay, a trial, examination, essayer, to test. It. assaggiare, to try, from L. assagium, a weighing. Essay is the same word, but now differently used.] 1.† Examination; trial; attempt; essay. 'He hath made an essay of her virtue.' Shak.

Neither is it enough to have taken a slender taste or essay thereof. Clay.

This cannot be, by no essay of reason. Shak.

Hence—2.† Trial by danger; risk; adventure.

Through many hard assays which did betide. Spenser.

3.† Emotion.

She heard with patience all unto the end, And strove to smother her sorrowful assay. Spenser.

4. The trial of the goodness, purity, weight, value, &c., of metals or metallic substances, as ores and alloys; any operation or experiment for ascertaining the quantity of a precious metal in an ore or mineral, or in coin or bullion. See ASSAYING.—5. The substance to be assayed. Fre.—6.† Value; ascertained purity; as, 'Stones of great assay.' Spenser.—7. In law, an examination of weights and measures by the standard. Cowell.—Assay, Analysis. Assay is the analysis of metals, and is thus a word of narrower signification than the latter. [Assay formerly had the meaning of assay, but it is now confined to bodily and intellectual efforts.]

Assay (as-sá), v.t. 1. To examine by trial; to put to trial; as, to assay armour. [Obsolete or poetical.] Specifically—2. To make trial of, as an ore or metallic compound, with the view of determining the proportion of a particular metal present.—3.† To attempt; to endeavour.

She hath assayed as much as may be proved. Shak.

Often with an infinitive as object.

He assayed to go. Sam. xvii. 30.

[In this sense essay is now used.]—4.† To endeavour to influence. 'Bid herself assay him.' Shak.—5. To try the effect of.

Soft words to his fierce passion she assayed. Milton.

6.† To affect; to move. 'When the heart is ill assayed.' Spenser.

Assay† (as-sá), v.t. To make an attempt or endeavour.

Assayer (as-sá'ér), n. 1. One who examines metallic ores or alloys for the purpose of determining the amount of any particular metal in the same, particularly of gold and silver. Specifically—2. An officer of the Mint, whose office it is to test bullion and coin.

Assaying (as-sá'ing), n. The act or art of testing metals, ores, or alloys in order to ascertain the quantity of gold or silver or any other metal present in them. There are two modes by which the art of assaying is performed, and sometimes the one is employed to corroborate the other. The one is called the humid or wet process, by which a solution of the metals is effected by means of acids, after which those sought for are precipitated by proper reagents. The other is called the dry process, and is performed by the agency of fire. The first is generally employed for the purpose of estimating the quantity of gold or silver in an alloy, and the second is chiefly applied to ores. In Great Britain each article of silver or gold plate is assayed at Goldsmiths' Hall previously to being sold to determine the exact richness of the metal of which it is made.

Assay-master (as-sá'mas'tér), n. An assayer; an officer appointed to try the weight and fineness of the precious metals.

Asse (as), n. The Vulpes Canis, the smallest member of the genus fox, a native of South Africa, and highly valued for its fur. It lives on eggs, especially on those of the ostrich, which, being too large and smooth to be grasped by its teeth it manages to break by rolling with its fore-feet against a stone or against each other.

Association (as-sek-tá'shon), n. [L. associatio, from associor, to attend upon—ad, and sector, freq. of sequor, to follow.] Attendance or waiting upon. Bayley.

Assurance (as-sé-kúr'ans), n. [L. ad, to, and securus, secure.] Assurance. 'These assurances which they give in the Popish Church.' Sheldon.

Assuration† (as-sé-kú-rá'shon), n. Assurance; a making secure.

How far then reaches this assuration? so far as to exclude all fears, all doubts? Ep. Hall.

Assure† (as-sé-kúr'), v.t. [L.L. assuero—L. ad, to, and securus, secure.] To make secure; to make sure or certain.

Sin is not helped but by being assured of pardon. Ep. Hall.

Association (as-sé-kú'shon), n. [From L. associor, associatum, to obtain—ad, and sequor, to follow.] An obtaining or acquiring.

His first (benefice) . . . is immediately void by his association of a second. Archbp.

Assagai. See ASSAGAI.

Assage, v. Siege. Chaucer.

Assamble (as-sem'blá), n. [See ASSEMBLY.]

1. The act of assembling, or state of being assembled; association. 'In sweet assamble every blooming grace.' Fenton.

2. A collection of individuals or of particular things; as, an assamble of men of note; an assamble of various materials.—3. The act of fitting together, as parts of a machine. See ASSEMBLING.

Assemblance† (as-sem'blans), n. [As, for L. ad, to, and semblance (which see).] Representation; likeness; semblance.

Care I for the . . . assemblance of a man? give me the spirit. Shak.

Assemblance† (as-sem'blans), n. An assemblage; a collection. 'To weet the cause of their assemblance wide.' Spenser.

Assemble (as-sem'bl), v.t. pret. & pp. assembled; ppr. assembling. [Fr. assembler, to bring or gather together, from L.L. assimulo, to assemble—L. ad, to, and simul, together; ultimately from the same root as E same (which see).] 1. To collect into one place or body; to bring or call together; to convene; to congregate. 'Thither he assembled all his train.' Milton.—2. To fit together. See ASSEMBLING.—SYN. To convene, collect, congregate, muster, convoke.

Assemble (as-sem'bl), v.t. 1. To meet or come together; to convene, as a number of individuals. 'The church assembled.' Dryden. 2.† To have carnal connection; to cohabit. Chaucer; Gower.

Assemble† (as-sem'bl), v.t. [L. assimulo, to compare—ad, to, and simulo, to liken, from similis, like.] To liken or compare.

Assemble (as-sem'bl), n. An assembly.

Assembler (as-sem'bl-ér), n. One who assembles.

Assembling (as-sem'bl-ing), n. 1. A collecting or meeting together. Heb. x. 25. Specifically—2. The act of fitting together parts of machines and instruments, such as sewing-machines, guns, microscopes, &c., especially when the parts are made exactly to certain shapes and dimensions so as to be promiscuously interchangeable. E. H. Knight.—Assembling bolt, a bolt for holding together two or more removable pieces of a machine or instrument.

Assembly (as-sem'bl), n. [Fr. assemblée. See ASSEMBLY.] 1. A company or collection of human beings in the same place, usually for the same purpose, whether religious, political, instructive, or social.—2. Specifically, (a) the name given to the legislative body or one of the divisions of it in various states. (b) A company of persons of both sexes met for dancing; a ball; especially, a subscription-ball; a ball the expenses of which are defrayed by the subscriptions of those who take part in it.—3. Mitá, the second beating of the drum before a march, when the soldiers strike their tents.—4.† An assemblage or collection of inanimate objects. 'From Murano to Venice, or to any of the little assembly of islands about her.' Howell.—The General Assembly of the Established or Free Church of Scotland, the supreme church judicature meeting annually, and composed of ministers and ruling elders delegated by each presbytery, and also, in the case of the Established Church, of an elder from each royal burgh and university.—Assembly of Divines at Westminster, a convocation summoned by the Long Parliament to determine the constitution of a church for England and Scotland, consisting of 135 English clerical and lay members, and six from Scotland. Presbyterians formed a large majority. The chief fruits of its labours were the Directory of Public Worship, the Confession of Faith, and the Larger and Shorter Catechisms.

Assembly-room (as-sem'blî-rôm), n. A room in which persons assemble, especially for dancing. See ASSEMBLY.

Assent (as-sent'), n. [O. Fr. assent, assens, from L. assensus, from assentior, to assent—ad, and sensio, to think, a stem which appears also in consent, dissent, sense, &c.] 1. The act of the mind in admitting or agreeing to the truth of a proposition.

Faith is the assent to any proposition on the credit of the proposer. Lect.

2. Consent; concurrence; acquiescence; agreement to a proposal; as, the bill before the house has the assent of a great majority of the members.

Without the king's assent or knowledge
You wrought to be a legate. Shak.

3. Accord; agreement; approval.

Too many people read this rhapsody with assent and admiration. Macaulay.

—Royal assent, the approbation given by the sovereign in parliament to a bill which has passed both houses, after which it becomes law. This assent may be given in two ways: (a) In person, when the sovereign comes to the House of Peers, the commons being sent for, and the titles of all the bills which have passed are read. The royal assent is declared in Norman-French by the clerk of the parliament, with several singular ceremonies. (b) By letters-patent under the great seal, signed by the sovereign, and notified in his absence. A money bill, or bill of supply, passed by the House of Commons, is presented by the speaker for the royal assent—Assent, Consent. Assent is a word of wider application than consent, the latter having only the meaning of acquiescence in a proposal, while assent has both that meaning and that of agreement to an abstract proposition. Baxter speaks of justifying faith as the assenting trust of the understanding and the consenting trust of the will.—SYN. Accord, agreement, concurrence, approbation.

Assent (as-sent'), v. i. To admit a thing as true; to express an agreement of the mind to what is alleged or proposed; to concur; to acquiesce.

The Jews also assented, saying that these things were so. Acts xxiv. 9.

Dama with faint praise, assent with civil leer,
And, without sneering, teach the rest to sneer. Pope.

SYN. To agree, concur, acquiesce, approve. Assentation (as-sen-tâ-shon), n. [L. assentatio, flattery or servile assent, from assentor, to assent from interested motives, to flatter, from assentior, to assent. See ASSENT, n.] Obsequious assent to the opinion of another; flattery; adulation.

It is a fearful presage of ruin when the prophets conspire in assentation. Bp. Hall.

Words smooth and sweeter-sounded are to be used, rather than rough or harsh, as adore for worship, assentation for flattery. Instructions for Oratory, 1682.

Assentator† (as-sen-tâ-tôr), n. A flatterer. Sir T. Elyot.

Assentatorily† (as-sen-tâ-to-ri-ly), adv. With adulation or obsequiousness. Bacon.

Assessment (as-ses'ment), n. 1. The act of assessing; as, (a) the act of determining the amount of damage, as by a jury. (b) A valuation of property, profits, or income, for the purpose of taxation. An assessment is a valuation made by authorized persons according to their discretion, as opposed to a sum certain or determined by law. It may be a direct charge of the tax to be paid, or a valuation of the property of those who are to pay the tax, for the purpose of fixing the proportion which each man shall pay, on which valuation the law imposes a specific sum upon a given amount.—2. A tax or specific sum charged on a person or property.

Assessor (as-ses'ôr), n. 1. One appointed to make assessments, especially for purposes of taxation.—2. An inferior officer of justice, who sits to assist a judge. In England assessors are persons chosen to assist the mayor and aldermen of corporations in matters concerning elections. In Scotland the magistrates of corporate burghs who exercise judicial powers generally employ some professional lawyer to act as their assessor, whose duty it is to see that proper judicial control is exercised over the pleadings, and to make out drafts of the judgments.

Minors the strict inquisitor appears,
And lives and crimes with his assessors hears. Dryden.

3. One who sits by another, as next in dignity or as an associate in office. 'Don Quixote, or his assessors, the curate and the barber.' Warton. In the Scotch universities the title assessor is given to the elected or nominated members of the university court or supreme governing body of the university.

Assessorial (as-ses-sô-ri-âl), a. Pertaining to an assessor, or a court of assessors.

Asset (as'set), n. [O. Fr. aset, assez, assetz, assietz, Fr. assez, Fr. assatz, Sp. asas, enough, from L. ad, to, and satis, enough. The O. E. aseth, aseth, enough, satisfaction, may perhaps be a form of this word, but more probably it is of different origin. See ASSTHEMENT.] 1. In law, an article of goods or property available for the payment of a bankrupt or deceased person's obligations or debts; generally used in the plural in the sense of money, goods, or estate of a deceased or insolvent person, subject by law to the payment of his debts and legacies. Assets are real or personal. Real assets are lands which descend to the heir, subject to the fulfilment of the obligations of the ancestor; personal assets are the money or goods of the deceased or insolvent, or debts due to him, which come into the hands of the executor or administrator, or which he is bound to collect and convert into money.—2. Any portion of the entire property or effects belonging to a person; as, I consider these shares a valuable asset; my assets are much greater than my liabilities.

Assett,† a. or n. [See ASSET.] Sufficient; enough.

Yet never shall make his riches Assett unto his greediness. Chaucer.

Asserve† (as-sér'v'), v. t. To asseverate.

Anselmus . . . not asserveth it, but also endeavour . . . to set out the true proportion of it. Fatherby.

Asseserate (as-sér'ér-ât), v. t. pret. & pp. asseserated; ppp. asseserating. [L. assesero, asseseratum, to affirm earnestly, to maintain—ad, to, and severo, serious, earnest.] To affirm or aver positively, or with solemnity.

It is impossible to calculate the good that such a work would have done if half which is asseserated had only been proved. J. F. Blunt.

SYN. To affirm, assert, protest, pronounce, assure, declare.

Asseseration (as-sér'ér-â'shon), n. Positive affirmation or assertion; solemn declaration.

[O.Sc. siðhe, siðh, gratification, satisfaction; perhaps same as Gael. siòth, siðh, peace, reconciliation, or connected with Icel. siðt, siðt, reconciliation, agreement.] In Scots law, an indemnification due to the heirs of a person murdered from the person guilty of the crime. Where the criminal has suffered the pains of law no claim for assythemment lies.

Astacian (as-tā-si-an), n. A crustaceous animal of the family Astacina.

Astacina, Astacidae (as-tā-si'-na, as-tar'-i-dē), n. pl. [See ASTACUS.] A family of macrurus crustaceans, of the order Podophthalma (stalk-eyed), and sub-order Decapoda, or those having five pairs of thoracic limbs.

Astacite, Astacoolite (as-tā-sit, as-tak'-o-lit), n. [Gr. astakos, acrayfish, and lithos, a stone.] A petrified or fossil crayfish, or other crustaceous animal.

Astacus (as-tā-kus), n. [Gr. astakos, acrayfish or lobster.] A genus of long-tailed crustaceous animals, including the crayfish (A. fluviatilis), and the curious species without eyes (A. pellucidus) found in the caves of Kentucky. The marine lobsters (A. marinus, &c.) are now referred to another genus, Homarus, of which Nephrops is a sub-genus. See ASTACINA.

Astarte, Astert (a-stārt', a-stērt'), v. t. To cause to start; to startle.

No danger there the shepherd can astert. Spenser.

Astarte, Astert (a-stārt', a-stērt'), v. i. 1. To start up.—2. To escape. Chaucer.

Astarte (as-tār'tē), n. [See ASHTORETH.] 1. Ashtoreth, the principal female divinity of the Phenicians.—2. The moon.

Astarte's bediamonded crescent, Distinct with its duplicate horn. Poe.

3. A genus of lamellibranchiate molluscs, section Siphonida, family Cyprinidae. Some of them are English shells, and they are found generally on the sand mud of coasts. There are also many fossil species.

Astati (a-stā'tik), a. [Gr. a, priv., and stas, to stand.] Being without polarity.—Astati needle, a magnetic needle, having its directive property destroyed by the proximity of another needle of the same intensity fixed parallel to it, but with the poles reversed, so that the north pole of the one is adjacent to the south pole of the other. In this position the needles neutralize each other, and are therefore unaffected by the magnetism of the earth, while at the same time they are subject to the influence of galvanic action. They were formerly employed in the electric telegraph.

Astatiically (a-stat'-ik-al-ly), adv. In an astatic manner.

Astay (a-stā'), adv. Naut. said of the anchor when, in heaving in, the cable forms such an angle with the surface of the water as to appear in a line with the stays of the ship.

beed in a mine, to protect them from any portion of the roof falling.

Aster (as'ter), n. [Gr astrō, a star] A large genus of plants, nat. order Compositae, scattered over the world, but especially abundant in N. America. One species, A. Trifolium (the sea-side aster), is found abundantly in salt marshes in Britain. It has a pretty purple flower. Asters are generally called Michaelmas or Christmas daisies, because of their flowering late in the season, and on this account they are highly prized in our gardens. The China aster does not belong to this genus. It is Callistephus chinensis.

Asteracanthus (as'ter-a-k'an'thus), n. [Gr astrō a star, and akantos, a spine] A genus of placoid fossil fishes, occurring in the coelites and lias.

Asteraceae (as'ter-ā-sē-ā), n. pl. [Gr astrō, a star] In bot. a name given by some to the nat. order Compositae.

Asteria (as'ter-i-ā), n. A variety of asaphid, not perfectly transparent, but showing a star-like opalescence in the direction of the axis, if cut round.

Asteridae (as'ter-i-dē), n. pl. A family of star-fishes, order Asteroidae, possessing four rows of tentacular feet in each ray, all the others having only two.

Asterias (as'ter-i-as), n. [Gr astrō, a star] A genus of Echinodermata, family Asteriidae, order Asteroidae or star-fishes. See ASTEROIDAE.

Asteriated (as'ter-i-ā-ted), a. [See above.] Radiated, presenting diverging rays, like a star, as, asteriated asaphid.

Asterian, Asteridian (as'ter-id, as'ter-i-dan), n. Same as Asteroidian.

Asterium (as'ter-i-ūm), n. pl. The star-fishes, an order belonging to the class Echinodermata, so called from their star-like form. They have a coriaceous skin, in which are implanted spines or tubercles. Their body is expanded into arms, the under surface of which is marked with grooves, radiating from the centre, and pierced with rows of holes, whence issue tentacular feet, by means of which the animals move. Most have five arms or rays, but some have more, varying from eight to thirty. They have the power of reproducing these arms if broken off, and if an entire arm, with a small portion of the body attached to it, be torn off, a fresh perfect animal is formed. Their mouth is in the inferior centre of the rays, is not provided with teeth, and leads by a short gullet into a large stomach, from which a pair of lateral tubes are prolonged into each ray. A distinct intestine and anus may or may not be present. They feed chiefly on molluscs.

Asteridian (as'ter-i-dian), n. A member of the Asteriidae.

Asterisk (as'ter-isk), n. [Gr astrōskos, a little star, from astrō, a star] The figure of a star, thus, * used in printing and writing, as a reference to a passage or note in the margin, or to fill the space when a name is omitted.

Asterism (as'ter-izm), n. [Gr asterismos, a marking with stars, from astrō, a star] 1. A collection of stars, formerly used for constellation, but now appropriated to signify any small cluster which it is either desirable to distinguish from the rest of the constellation in which it lies, or which is not a part of any particular constellation. 2. An asterisk, or mark of reference. [Rare.]—3. Three asterisks placed thus  to direct attention to some passage.—4. That branch of astrology which is based only on the fixed stars, as cultivated in India and Arabia. [Rare.]

Backward, back said of a ship, as, the current drove us far astern.—To back astern, to go stern foremost, mid of a ship.—To be astern of the reckoning, to be behind the position given for a vessel by the reckoning.

Asteroid (as'ter-oid), n. [Gr astrō, a star, and oides form.] One of the small planets, about 100 in number, between the orbits of Mars and Jupiter, more accurately called planetoids. See PLANETOID.

Asteroid (as'ter-oid), n. Star-like; especially belonging to the Aleymania, or asteroid polypus.

Asteroida (as'ter-oid-ā), n. pl. Same as Aleymania (which see).

Asteroidal (as'ter-oid-ēl), a. 1. Resembling a star. 2. Pertaining to the asteroida.—3. Pertaining to the star-fishes.

Asteroides (as'ter-oid-ēs), n. pl. A term sometimes used as the equivalent of Asteroida, sometimes as including, along with that order, the Ophiroides, or star-fishes with discoid bodies.

Asterolepis (as'ter-ō-lē-pis), n. [Gr astrō, a star, and lepis, a scale] A genus of giganthic ganoid fishes, now found only in a fossil state in the old red sandstone. From the remains it would seem that these fishes must have sometimes attained the length of 18 or 20 feet.

1. Hyoid plate of Asterolepis, 1-8th natural size.
2. Internal edge of hyoid plate, 1-8th natural size.

feet. The structure of this curious fossil was elucidated by Hugh Miller in his work Footprints of the Creator, or, the Asterolepis of Stromness. The engraving shows one of its most characteristic bones, the hyoid plate, with its central strengthening ridge. The stellate markings from which the genus derives its name seem to have been restricted to the dorsal plates of the head.

Asterophyllite (as'ter-ō-fil-it), n. A member of the genus Asterophyllites.

Asterophyllites (as'ter-ō-fil-itēs), n. [Gr astrō, a star, and phyllos, a leaf] Star-leaf, a genus of fossil plants, so called from the stellate disposition of the leaves round the branches. They abound in the coal-measures, and are believed to be the foliage of the Calamites.

Astori, v. t. and i. See ASTARY.

Asthénia, Astheny (as'thē-ni-ā, as'thē-ni-ā), n. [Gr asthēnia, See ASTHENIC] Debility; want of strength.

Asthénie (as'thē-ni-ē), n. [Gr a, priv., and sthenos, strength] Weak; characterized by debility.

Asthénology (as'thē-nō-lō-jī), n. [Gr a, priv., sthenos, strength, and logos, discourse.] The doctrine of diseases connected with debility.

Asthma (as'tma), n. [Gr asthma, short-drawn breath.] A chronic disorder of respiration, with intermissions between its attacks, characterized by difficulty of breathing (which is accompanied by a wheezing sound and feeling of tightness about the chest), a cough, and expectoration. Asthma generally attacks persons advanced in years, and seems, in some instances, to be hereditary. It seldom proves fatal except as inducing dropsy, consumption, &c.

Asthmatic, Asthmatical (as't-mat'ik, as't-mat'ik-ēl), a. 1. Pertaining to asthma; as, asthmatic symptoms.—2. Affected by asthma, as, an asthmatic patient.

Asthmatic (as't-mat'ik), n. A person troubled with asthma.

Asthmaticity (as't-mat'ik-ēl-ē-ti), adv. In an asthmatic manner.

Astigmatism (as'tig-mat-izm), n. [Gr a, neg., and stigma, stigmat, a mark.] In optics, the name given to a malformation, congenital or accidental, of the lens of the eye, of such a nature that rays of light proceeding from one centre do not converge in the same point.

Astipulate (as'tip'ū-lāt), v. t. To agree.

Astringency (as-trin'jen-si), n. The quality of being astringent; that quality in medicines by which they cause contraction of soft or relaxed parts of the body; as, the astringency of acids or bitters.

Astringent (as-trin'jent'), a. Binding; contracting; strengthening; opposed to laxative. 'A strengthening and astringent diet.' Arbutnot.

Astringent (as-trin'jent'), n. A medicine which contracts the organic textures and canals of the body, condensing the soft solids, and thereby checking or diminishing excessive discharges. The chief astringents are the mineral acids, alum, lime-water, chalk, salts of copper, zinc, iron, lead, silver; and among vegetables catechu, kino, oak-bark, and galls. Vegetable astringents owe their efficacy to the presence of tannin.

Astringently (as-trin'jent-li), adv. In an astringent manner.

Astringer† (as-trin'jer), n. [O. Fr. astour, Fr. astour, a gohawk.] A falconer. Written also Astringer.

Astrite (as-trit'), n. [Gr. astér, a star.] A radiated or star-like fossil, as one of the detached articulations of fossil encrinurites; star-stone. See ENCRINURITE.

Astrocaryum (as-tró-ká'ri-um), n. [Gr. astron, a star, and karyon, a nut.] A genus of palms inhabiting the tropical parts of America, from 10 to 40 feet in height, with beautiful pinnated leaves. The stems are covered over with stiff and sharp spines often 1 foot in length. The seed is inclosed in a hard stony nut, and that is enveloped by a fleshy fibrous pericarp. The cattle of the Upper Amazons feed on the fleshy pericarp of A. Murumuru. The wood of A. Ayri is much used for bows and similar purposes; and the fibres of the leaves of A. Tucuma are used for fishing-nets.

Astrofel,† Astrofel† (as-tró-fel), n. [L. astrum, a star, and fel, gall.] A species of bitter herb, probably the same as aster or star-wort. Written also Astrophell.

My little flock whom erst I loved so well,
And wont to feed on finest grass that grew,
Feed ye henceforth on bitter astrofells. Spenser.

Astrogony (as-tro-gó-ni), n. Knowledge of the stars in respect to their names, magnitudes, situations, and the like.

Astrography (as-tro-grá-fi), n. [Gr. astér or astron, a star, and grapho, to describe.] A description of, or the art of describing or delineating, the stars.

Astroid (as-troid'), n. In her, a star consisting of six points or more, in distinction from a mullet, consisting only of five.

Astroit (as-troit'), n. Star-stone. See ASTRITE.

Astrolabe (as-tró-láb), n. [Gr. astér, a star, and lamban, labb, to take.] 1. An instrument formerly used for taking the altitude of the sun or stars at sea, now superseded by Hadley's quadrant and sextant.—2. A stereographic projection of the sphere, either upon the plane of the equator, the eye being supposed to be in the pole of the world, or upon the plane of the meridian, the eye being in the point of intersection of the equinoctial and the horizon.—3.† The same as the modern armillary sphere. Called Astrolaby by Chaucer.

Astrolatry (as-trol'a-tri), n. [Gr. astér, a star, and latreia, worship.] The worship of the stars.

Astrolithology (as-tró-li-thol'o-jí), n. [Gr. astér, a star, lithos, a stone, and logos, discourse.] The science of aerolites. Dana.

Astrologer (as-tról'o-jér), n. [L. astrologus—Gr. astron, a star, and logos, discourse.] 1. One who professes to foretell future events by the position and appearance of the stars. 'Astrologers that future fates forecast.' Pope.—2.† An astronomer.

A worthy astrologer, by perspective glasses, hath found in the stars many things unknown to the ancients. Sir W. Raleigh.

The astrologer is he that knoweth the course and motion of the heavens and teacheth the same. Hooper.

Astrologic, Astrological (as-tról'o-jí'ik, as-tról'o-jí'ik-al), a. Pertaining to astrology; professing or practising astrology. 'No astrologic wizard.' Dryden.

Astrologically (as-tról'o-jí'ik-al-li), adv. In an astrological manner; in the manner of astrology.

Astrologia (as-trō'-lō-jā), s. l. To practise astrology.

Astrology (as-trō'-lō-jī), n. [Gr. astron, a star, and logos, rational discourse, reason, theory, science.] 1. The science or doctrine of the stars, and formerly often used as equivalent to astronomy, but now restricted in meaning to the pseudo-science which pretends to enable men to judge of the effects and influences of the heavenly bodies on human and other mundane affairs, and to foretell future events by their situations and conjunctions. — Natural astrology, that branch of astrology which professed to predict natural effects, such as changes of the weather, winds, storms, &c. — Judicial astrology, that branch which pretended to foretell moral events, such as have a dependence on the free-will and agency of man, as if they were produced or directed by the stars. Astrology was formerly in great repute, as men ignorantly supposed the heavenly bodies to have a ruling influence over the physical and moral world, thus one's temperament was ascribed to the planet under which he was born, as Saturnine from Saturn, Jovial from Jupiter, Mercurial from Mercury &c., and the virtues of herbs, gems, and medicines were supposed to be due to their ruling planets.

Astrometeorology (as-trō'-mē-tē-ol'-ō-jī), n. [Gr. astron, a star, metron, measure, and logos, discourse.] The art of foretelling the weather and its changes from the appearance of the moon and stars.

Astrometer (as-trō'-mē-tēr), n. [Gr. astron, a star, and metron, a measure.] One who or that which measures the stars, or the light of the stars, specifically, an instrument invented by Mr John Herschel for estimating the brightness of the fixed stars. The object of the instrument is to bring an image of Jupiter, the moon, or some other object of recognized brightness into direct comparison with a star, so that star and image are seen in the same direction. By adjusting the distance of the image so that it appears equal in brightness to the star, and by measuring this distance, the lustre of the star is readily determined.

Astrometry (as-trō'-mē-tēr), n. The art of determining by measurement the relative distances and magnitudes of the stars.

Astrometer (as-trō'-mē-tēr), n. One who is versed in astronomy, one who has a knowledge of the laws of the heavenly bodies, or the principles by which their motions are regulated, with their various phenomena. — 2. An astrologer. 'Astrometers foretell it.' Shak.

Astrometrical (as-trō'-mē-tēr-ē-āl), n. An astrometer. 'Astrometrical came from the East.' Watts.

Astrometrical (as-trō'-mē-tēr-ē-āl), n. Pertaining to astronomy. — Astrometrical clock, a clock regulated to keep sidereal, not mean time. — Astrometrical signs, the signs of the zodiac. — Astrometrical year. See YEAR.

Astrometrical (as-trō'-mē-tēr-ē-āl), adv. In an astrometrical manner, by the principles of astrometry.

Astrometrical (as-trō'-mē-tēr-ē-āl), n. A treatise on the stars.

Astrometrical (as-trō'-mē-tēr-ē-āl), s. l. To study astronomy. 'They astrometrical in caves.' Sh. T. Brown.

Astronomy (as-trō'-nō-mī), n. [Gr. astron, a star, and nomos, a law or rule.] 1. The science which treats of the celestial bodies — fixed stars, planets, satellites, and comets — their nature, distribution, magnitudes, motions, distances, periods of revolution, eclipses, &c. That part of the science which gives a description of the motions, figures, periods of revolution, and other phenomena of the heavenly bodies, is called descriptive astronomy, that part which teaches how to observe the motions, figures, periodical revolutions, distances, &c., of the heavenly bodies, and how to use the necessary instruments, is called practical astronomy; and that part which explains the causes of their motions, and demonstrates the laws by which those causes operate, is termed physical astronomy. — 2. Astrology.

Not from the stars do I my judgments pluck,
And yet methinks I have astronomy. Shak.

Astrophotography (as-trō'-fō-tō-g'ra-fī), n. [Gr. astron, a star, and phōtography,] 1. In photography a term expressing the application of photography to the delineation of solar spots, the moon's disc, the planets, and constellations.

Astroscope (as-trō'-shēp), n. [Gr. astron, a star, and skopos, to view.] An astronomical instrument, composed of two cones, on whose surface the constellations, with their stars, are delineated, by means of which the stars may be known; an old substitute for a celestial globe.

Astroscope (as-trō'-shēp), n. [See ASTROSCOPE.] Observation of the stars.

Astro-theology (as-trō'-thē-ol'-ō-jī), n. [L. astrum, a star, and theologia, divinity.] Theology founded on the observation of the celestial bodies.

Attractive (a-struk'tiv), a. [L. attrahere, to build up — a for ad, to, and trahere, to build.] Building up, erecting, opposed to destruction.

The true method of Christian practice is first destructive, then attractive. . . . 'Come to the end, learn to do well.' St. Basil.

Astrut (a-strut'), s. [See STRUT.] Strutting; pomposity. 'Inflated and astrut with self-content.' Cropper (Rare.)

Astutiously (a-stru'thu-ē-ē), adv. [Based on Fr. astutious, astute. See ASTUTE.] Astutely.

'But marked you not how astutiously the great father studied the question?' said the queen. Sir W. Scott.

Astum (a-stur'), s. l. To stun.

Brashness and astum'd
His trunk extended lay. Samuel Johnson.

Astur (as-tur'), n. [Fr. astour, I. astore, the goosawk.] A genus of hawk, including the goosawk (Astur palumbarius).

Asturian (as-tū'-ri-an), n. Pertaining to Astoria or the Astorian, a district of northern Spain.

Asturian (as-tū'-ri-an), n. A native or inhabitant of Asturia.

Astute (as-tūt'), a. [L. astutus, from astus, craft, subtlety.] Of a shrewd and penetrating turn, cunning; sagacious. 'That astute little lady of Curzon Street.' Thackeray — 875 Shrewd, keen, eagle-eyed, penetrating, cunning, sagacious, subtle, witty, crafty, smart, clever, wide-awake.

Astutely (as-tūt'-lī), adv. In an astute manner, shrewdly, sharply, cunningly.

Astuteness (as-tūt'-nēs), n. The quality of being astute, cunning, shrewdness.

Astyler (a-stī-lēr), n. [Gr. a, priv., and stylon, a column.] In architecture having no column.

Astylian (a-stī-lē-an), n. In mining, a small ward or stoppage in an adit or mine to prevent the free passage of water, made by damming up. Watts.

Aunder (a-sun-dēr), adv. [Prefix a, and under, A Sax. underen. See UNDER.] 1. In a sundared or divided state; apart; into parts, separately.

The Lord hath cut asunder the cords of the wicked. Ps. cxix. 13.

What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder. Mat. xix. 6.

2. Fig. of different minds or conditions.

When the differing parties came to understand one another, they are found not to be so widely asunder. Brougham.

Aswall (as-wāl), n. The native name for the sloth-bear (Ursus labialis) of the mountains of India. It is an uncouth, unyielding animal, with very long black hair, ignominious when not attached. Owing to its exceeding sensitiveness to heat it confines itself to its den during the day. It never eats vegetable animals except when pressed by hunger, its usual diet consisting of roots, bees'-neats, grubs, snails, ants, &c. Its flesh is in much favour as an article of food, and its fat is highly valued for the lubrication of the delicate steel work in gun-locks. When captured young it is easily tamed, and can be taught to perform many curious tricks.

Aswara, s. l. [A. Sax. aswara, to stun or astonish, from as, to, and swara, to sleep.] To stupify, as by terror. 'Astounded and aswared.' Chaucer.

Asworn, *Asworned, adv. In a sworn. 'Fell to the ground asworn.' *Geoffrey.

Ayile (a-il), n. An asylum.

Asylum (a-sī-lum), n. [L. asylum, from Gr. asylon, a place of refuge, sanctuary — a, priv., and sylo, to strip, plunder.] 1. A sanctuary or place of refuge, where criminals and debtors sheltered themselves from justice, and from which they could not be taken without sacrilege. Temples were anciently asylums, as were Christian churches in later times.

No sacred was the church in some that it had the right of an asylum or sanctuary. Lyf.

2. Any place of retreat and security.

Earth has no other asylum for them than in one cold bosom. Smollett.

Specifically — 3. An institution for receiving, maintaining, and, as far as possible, ameliorating the condition of persons labouring under certain bodily defects or mental maladies, as, an asylum for the blind, for the deaf and dumb, for the insane, &c.; sometimes also a refuge for the unfortunate, as, a magdalen asylum.

Asymmetrical (a-sim-met-ri-āl), a. Incommensurable, incommensurate. Cassini. [Rare.]

Asymmetrical (a-sim-met-ri-āl), a. [A priv., and symmetrical.] 1. Not having symmetry.

No one imagines the Placentaria being to an asymmetrical type, because they are asymmetrical in their adult shape. Humboldt.

2. In math. not having commensurability; incommensurable. — 3. Inharmonious; not reconcilable. Boyle [Rare.]

Asymmetrical (a-sim-met-ri-āl), a. Same as Asymmetrical (which see).

Asymmetry (a-sim-met-ri), n. [Gr. a, priv., and symmetria, symmetry.] 1. The want of symmetry or proportion between the parts of a thing.

The asymmetry of the brain, as well as the deformation of the legs or face, may be rectified in time. H. Green.

2. The want of a common measure between two quantities, incommensurability. Barrow.

Asymptote (as-im-tōt'), n. [Gr. asymptotes, not falling together — a, priv., syn, with, and ptotes, to fall, not meeting or coinciding.] In math. a line which approaches nearer and nearer to some curve, but though infinitely extended would never meet it. This may be conceived as a tangent to a curve at an infinite distance.

Asymptote (as-im-tōt'), n. In math. gradually approaching, as a line to a curve, but never converging. See the noun.

Asymptotic, Asymptotical (as-im-tōt'-ē-āl, as-im-tōt'-ē-āl), a. Belonging to or having the character of an asymptote. — Asymptotic lines or curves are such as continually approach when extended, but never meet.

Asymptotically (as-im-tōt'-ē-āl), adv. In an asymptotic manner, in a manner so as gradually to approach though never meeting.

The theory is not a thing complete from the first, but a thing which grows, as it were, asymptotically towards certainty. Prof. Tyndall.

Asymptote (a-sim-tōt'), n. [Gr. asymptotes, disconnected, from a, not, and syn, to hang up with, to join together — syn, with, and sylo, to fasten to.] Disconnected; not fitted or adjusted. — Asymptote sentences, those whose members are not united by connective particles, as, 'I came, I saw, I conquered.' Brande Asymptote verse, a verse consisting of two members differing from each other in rhythm, as when the one consists of dactyls and the other of lambdas.

Ayndetic (as-in-det-ē-ē), a. Pertaining to or characterized by the use of ayndeton.

Ayndeton (a-sin-de-ton), n. [Gr. a, priv., and syndes, to bind together.] In rhet. a figure of speech by which connectives are omitted, as, veni, vidi, vici, I came, I saw, I conquered.

Heal the sick, cleanse the lepers, raise the dead, cast out devils. Mat. ix. 1.

It stands opposed to polysyndeton, which is a multiplication of connectives.

At (at), prep. [A. Sax. at, Goth. O Sax. at, Icel. at, Sw. Dan, at, O H G at; allied to L. ad, to, Skr. adhi, upon.] 'Lost in modern German, and rare in Swedish and Danish, in more frequent use in English than any other kindred language, Icelandic only excepted.' Ferguson. In general it denotes the relation.

glass with divisions. The cavity of the ball and the tube are filled with water, and the top of the tube closed. In this state the instrument is exposed to the free action of the air, when the water transudes through the porous substance, and is evaporated by the air, the extent of evaporation being shown by the sinking of the water in the graduated tube.

Atmosphere (at'-mos-fēr), n. [Of atmos, vapour, and sphaera, a sphere.] 1. The whole mass of aeriform fluid surrounding the earth, and generally supposed to extend to the height of 40 or 50 miles above its surface. It is a mechanical mixture of 79 volumes nitrogen, with 21 of oxygen, with a trace of carbonic acid gas, and a variable quantity of ozone, aqueous vapour, ammonia, and organic matter. The composition of the atmosphere varies very slightly in different localities. In towns the air usually contains impurities, such as sulphuric acid, hydrochloric acid, &c. These are dissolved in rain-water, which then has in many places an injurious effect on the buildings. The motions of the atmosphere constitute the winds, and in it occur clouds, rain, snow, thunder, and lightning. Its greatest density is at the earth's surface, and the density decreases as the height increases. The atmosphere, like other bodies, gravitates toward the earth, and therefore has weight and pressure. The weight, at an average, at the level of the sea, is found to be about 15 lb. on the square inch. (See Atmospheric Pressure, under ATMOSPHERIC.) If air be condensed so as to exert a pressure of 30 lb. on the square inch the pressure is said to be two atmospheres, a condensation which gives 45 lb. is termed three atmospheres, and so on. Pressures arising from other causes, such as the weight of liquids and the force of steam, are also frequently counted by atmospheres. The atmosphere acts on light, producing the phenomena of refraction, diffraction, reflection, and interference.—2. The gaseous envelope surrounding any other of the heavenly bodies.—3. Any gaseous medium. 'An atmosphere of cold oxygen.' Müller.—4. Fig. pervading influence, as, a moral atmosphere.

By the hearth the children sit,
Cold in that atmosphere of Death. Twain.

Atmospheric (at-mos-fer'ik), a. 1. Pertaining to, existing in, or consisting of the atmosphere, as, atmospheric air or vapours. 2. Dependent on the atmosphere.

I am an atmospheric creature. Page.

2. Caused, produced, or operated on by the atmosphere; as, rust, decomposition, or souring is often an atmospheric effect. — Atmospheric churn, a churn of various forms, in which atmospheric air is driven into the milk in order to agitate it, and also to obtain the specific effect of the air upon the milk in aggregation of the oleaginous globules. — Atmospheric engine, a variety of steam-engine, in which the steam is admitted only to the under side of the piston and for the up stroke, the steam being then condensed, and a vacuum thereby created under the piston, which in consequence descends by the pressure of the atmosphere acting on the upper surface of it. Marine engines on this principle have three cylinders connected to one crank ~~shaft~~ to obtain uniformity of action. — Atmospheric hammer, a power-hammer driven by the force of compressed air. — Atmospheric line (of a steam-pressure diagram), a line drawn by the pencil when the steam is shut off from the piston of the indicator, and it is acted on by the pressure of the atmosphere alone. The height of the steam-line above this shows the pressure of the steam, and the depth of the vacuum-line below shows the degree of condensation which is then taking place in the engine. — Atmospheric pressure, the weight of the atmosphere on a unit of surface, as a square inch. The mean atmospheric pressure referred to this unit is 14.7 lbs. It is also measured by the height of a mercurial column which it supports in a barometer; referred to this measurement the atmospheric pressure is equal to 29.9 inches. — Atmospheric railway, a railway so constructed that the motive power is derived from the pressure of the atmosphere acting on a piston working in a continuous iron tube of uniform bore laid from one place

Atone (a-tōn), v. t. 1. To expiate; to answer or make satisfaction for.

None should you heavens cease their heavenly strife,
Or such atone his guilty love with life. Page.

2. To bring to concord; to reconcile, as parties at variance. 'To atone two lamellates at variance.' Fodor.

I would do much
The four elements have atoned Ford.
3. To put in accordance; to bring on a level. 'To atone your fears with my more noble meaning.' Shak.—4. To unite in forming.

Atone-maker, i. n. (At-one-maker) One who makes reconciliation or atonement; a reconciler; a mediator.

And by that word (mediator) understand an atone-maker, a peace-maker, and bringer into grace and favour. Ford.

Atonement (a-tōn'ment), n. [At a bringing to be at one. Bishop Hall speaks of 'discord' Which never can be set at onement more.] 1. Agreement; concord; reconciliation, after enmity or controversy.

He seeks to make atonement
Between the Duke of Gloucester and your brothers. Shak.
2. Satisfaction or reparation made by giving an equivalent for an injury, or by doing or suffering that which is received in satisfaction for an offence or injury; expiation.

And Meers said to Aaron, Go to the altar and offer thy sin-offering, and thy burnt-offering, and make an atonement for thyself, and for the people. Lev. ix. 7.

When a man has been guilty of any vice the atonement he can make for it is to warn others not to fall into the like. Spectator.

3. In theol. the expiation of sin made by the obedience and personal sufferings of Christ.

The price of redemption (to use a scriptural metaphor) has been paid; the justice of God is satisfied, a full and complete atonement has been made. R. Hall.

Atoner (a-tōn'ēr), n. He who makes atonement.

Atonic (a-ton'ik), a. 1. In med. characterized by atony, or want of tone or vital energy; as, an atonic disease.—2. In gram. or philol. (a) unaccented. (b) Produced by the breath alone, surd.

Atonic (a-ton'ik), n. 1. In med. a drug capable of allaying organic excitement or irritation.—2. In gram. or philol. (a) a word that has no accent (b) An elementary sound produced by the breath, a surd consonant; a breathing. Goodrich.

Atony (at'-ō-ni), n. [Gr. atonia, defect—a. priv., and tonos, tone, from tonō, to stretch.] In med. a want of tone; defect of muscular power; weakness of every organ, particularly of those that are contractile, debility.

Atop (a-top), adv. [Prodr. a, on, and top. See Top.] On or at the top. 'The oil, which often swims atop of the decoction.' Arbutnot.

Atrabliarian (at'-ra-blī'-ri-an), a. [L. atra bilis, black bile.] Affected with melancholy; which the ancients attributed to black bile; very bilious. 'The atrabliarian constitution, or a black, viscous, pithy consistence of the fluids.' Arbutnot.

Atrabliarian (at'-ra-blī'-ri-an), n. A person of an atrabliarian temperament; a hypochondriac. Diwack.

Atrabliarous (at'-ra-blī'-ri-us), a. Same as Atrabliarian.

Atrabliarousness (at'-ra-blī'-ri-us-ness), n. The state of being atrabliarous, melancholy, or affected with disordered bile.

Atrabliar, Atrabliary (at'-ra-blī'-ar, at'-ra-blī'-a-ri), a. Melancholic or hypochondriacal, atrabliarous. 'Complexion of a complex atrabliar character, the final shade of which may be the pale sea-green.' Coryell—Atrabliary capsaules, the renal or suprarenal glands or capsules.

Atrablious (at'-ra-blī'-us), a. [See ATRA-BLIARIAN.] Melancholic or hypochondriacal from the supposed preponderance of black bile.

A hard-faced, atrablious, earnest-eyed man, still from long dwelling with the Lord in prayer, and who had taught Salas to dread the new Puritan king. J. R. Lowell.

Atramentarius (at'-ra-men-tā'-ri-us), a. [See ATRAMENTUM.] Like ink; suitable for making ink. The sulphate of iron, or copperas, is called atramentarius, as being a material in ink.

Atramentous (at'-ra-men-tūs), a. Same as Atramental.

Whenever provoked by anger or labour, an atramentous quality of most malignant nature was seen to distil from his lips. Swift.

Astred, i. a. [L. aster, black.] Tinged with a black colour. 'Yellow cholera or astred.' Whitaker.

Atrial (ā-trī-āl), a. Pertaining to an atrium; in zoöl. or pertaining to the atrium in the Tunicata.

Atrip (a-trīp), adv. [Prodr. a, and trip.] Next, said of an anchor when the purchase has just made it break ground, or raised it clear. Sails are atrip when they are hoisted from the cap, sheeted home, and ready for brimning. Yards are atrip when awayed up, ready to have the stops cut for crossing; so an upper mast is said to be atrip when the sd is loosed.

Atriplex (ā-trī-plēks), n. [Said to be from ater, black, and plexus, woven together, from the dark colour of some of the species.] A genus of plants, nat. order Chenopodiaceae; orache. They are mostly or acaly herba or shrubs, with small unisexual flowers, growing on shores and waste places. Five species are found in Britain. The garden orache, or mountain-spinach (A. hortensis), a native of Tartary, is much used in France as a spinach.

Atrium (ā-trī-um), n. [L.] 1. In anc. Rom. arch. the entrance-hall and most important, and usually the most splendid, apartment of a Roman house, generally ornamented with statues, family portraits, and other pictures, and forming the reception room for visitors and clients. In it the matron with her female slaves sat and spun, and the nuptial couch constituted part of its furniture. It was lighted by an opening in the roof called the compluvium, towards which the roof sloped, so as to throw the rain-water into a cistern in the floor called the impluvium.—2. A hall or court in front of the entrance of certain great ancient temples, pagan and early Christian.—3. An auricle of the heart.—4. In zoöl. applied to the large chamber or 'cloaca' into which the intestine opens in the Tunicata.

Atricious (a-trī-shus), a. [L. atrus fierce, cruel.] 1. Extremely heinous, criminal, or cruel, enormously or outrageously wicked. 'The atrocious guilt of being a young man.' Lord Chatham. 2. Expressing or revealing great atrocity. 'Revelations . . . so atrocious that nothing in history approaches them.' De Quincey.—3. Very grievous, violent; as, atrocious distemper.—SVN Flagrant, enormous, outrageous, flagitious, violent, heinous, horrid.

Atrociously (a-trī-shus-ly), adv. In an atrocious manner; with enormous cruelty or guilt.

Atrociousness (a-trī-shus-ness), n. The state or quality of being atrocious; atrocity.

The atrociousness of the crime made all men look with an evil eye upon the claim of any privilege which might prevent the severest justice. Burke.

Atrocity (a-trō-ti-ti), n. 1. The state or quality of being atrocious, enormous wickedness; extreme heinousness or cruelty.

The desired justice might be done upon offenders, as the atrocity of their crimes deserved. Clarendon. 2. A specific act of extreme heinousness or cruelty. 'The atrocities which attend a victory.' Macaulay.

Atropa (ā-trō-pā), n. [Gr. atropē, the Fate who cut the thread of life—a. not, and trōpē, to turn, lit. that which cannot be avoided.] A genus of poisonous narcotic plants, nat. order Solanaceae. A. Belladonna, or deadly nightshade, is a British species, with a shining black berry like a cherry, inclosed in the permanent calyx. It has a sweetish taste, but is poisonous. See BELLADONNA.

Atropal (ā-trō-pāl), a. [Gr. a. priv., and trōpē, to turn.] In bot. erect; orthotropous. said of an ovule.

Atrophy (at'-rō-fī), n. [Gr. atrophō—a. priv., and trōphō, to nourish.] A wasting of the flesh with loss of strength, the result of a morbid condition of the body, especially of the digestive organs, emaciation.

Atropia (a-trō-pī-ā), n. Same as Atropia.

Atropin, Atropine (ā-trō-pīn), n. (C₁₇H₁₇NO₃) A crystalline alkaloid obtained from the deadly nightshade (Atropa Belladonna). It is very poisonous, and produces persistent dilatation of the pupil.

Atropous (ā-trō-pūs), a. Same as Atropal.

Atrous (ā-trūs), a. [L. ater, black.] Intensely black.

Attabal, Attahall (at'-a-hal), n. Same as Atabal.

Attacca (at-tak'-ka) [It.] In music, a direction which denotes that the next movement is to follow immediately, without any pause.

Attach (at-tach'), v. t. [Fr. attacher, to tie or fasten, the same word (in a modified form) as attaquer, to attack, and It. attaccare, to fasten, to hang up, to attach, the root being seen in Arin (ach, Ir tace, a peg, a nail, E tack, a small nail; also in heel, tack, to tack; O.D. (tack), to touch, to fix.] 1. To make to adhere; to tie, bind, or fasten; as, to attach one thing to another by a string, by glue, &c.—2. Fig. to connect, to associate; as, to attach great importance to a particular circumstance.—3. To lay hold of; to seize. 'Attached with weariness.' Shak. Then honest every man attach the hard Of his fate mistress. Shak.

4. In law, to take by legal authority, to arrest the person by writ to answer for a debt; applied to a taking of the person by a civil process, being now never used for the arrest of a criminal, although formerly applied to arrests of all kinds. Thus we find Shakspeare using it with of before the charge. 'Of capital treason I attach you both.' Hen. IV. part II. act iv. 2. The term attach is now applied also to the taking of goods and real estate by an officer, by virtue of a writ or precept, to hold the same to satisfy a judgment to be rendered in the suit.—5. To take, seize, and lay hold on, by moral force, as by affection or interest, to fasten or bind by moral influence; to gain over; to win; as, his kindness attached us all to him.

Songs, garlands, flowers,
And charming symphonies attached the heart Of Adam. Milton.

SVN, To affix, bind, tie, tack, fasten, connect, subjoin, annex, win, gain over, charm, enamour.

Attach (at-tach'), v. i. To be attached or connected; to be joined or bound up with; to belong; with to.

The great interest which attaches to the mere knowledge of these facts cannot be doubted. Brougham.

Attach (at-tach'), n. Attachment. Pope.

Attachable (at-tach'-a-bl), a. Capable of being attached, legally or otherwise; liable to be taken by writ or precept.

Attaché (ā-tā-shā), n. [Fr.] One attached to another, as a part of his suite or attendants, specifically, one attached to an embassy or legation to a foreign court.

George Gaunt and I were intimate in early life: he was my junior when we were attached at Pompey-nichol together. Thackeray.

Attached (at-tach't), p. and a. 1. Closely united, bound by interest, affection, or special preference of any kind; as, an attached friend, more attached to one set of opinions than another.—2. In law, united under attachment, taken by writ or precept; as, attached property.

Attachment (at-tach'ment), n. 1. The act of attaching; specifically, in law, a taking of the person, goods, or estate by a writ or precept in a civil action to secure a debt or demand. Attachment is distinguished from arrest by proceeding out of a higher court by precept or writ, whereas the latter proceeds out of an inferior court by precept only, and by extending to a man's goods as well as to his person, and from distress by extending to a man's person as well as his goods. Attachment is the method which has always been used by the superior courts of justice for the punishment of all contempts of court. Mosley and Whiteley. Foreign attachment is the taking of the money or goods of a debtor in the hands of a stranger; as, when the debtor is not within the jurisdiction of the court, or has absconded. Any person who has goods or effects of a debtor, is considered in law as the agent, attorney, factor, or trustee of the debtor; and an attachment served on such person binds the property in his hands to respond the judgment against the debtor. The process of foreign attachment has existed from time immemorial in London, Bristol, Exeter, Lancaster, and some other towns in England, and by the Common Law Procedure Act of 1854 has been made general. In Scotland this proceeding is called arrestment. In the case of wages attachment was abolished in England in 1870.—Court of attachments, a court formerly held in England, before the vendors of the forest, to attack and try offenders against vert and venison.—2. A writ directing the person or estate of a person to be taken, to secure his appearance before a court.—3. Close adherence or affection; fidelity; regard; any passion or affection that binds a person.

Cromwell had to determine whether he would put to hazard the attachment of his party, the attachment of his army . . . to save a prince whom no engagement could bind. Macaulay.

4. That which attaches one thing to another, or a person to an object; as, the attachments of a muscle; the attachments of home.—5. That which is attached to a principal object; an adjunct; as, the Æolian attachment to the piano.

Attack (at-tak'), v.t. [Fr. attaquer; It. attaccare, to fasten, to engage in battle. This is another form of attack. See ATTACH.] 1. To assault; to fall upon with force; to assail, as with force and arms. It is the appropriate word for the commencing act of hostility between armies and navies. 2. To endeavour to injure, overthrow, or bring into discredit by any act or proposal, or by unfriendly words or writing, whether satire, calumny, criticism, or argument; as, to attack the constitution by legislative measures; to attack a man or his opinions in a pamphlet.

The people's interest is the only object that we have any right whatever to consider in deciding the question, whether or not the present state of things shall be submitted to or attacked. Brougham.

3. To begin to destroy or affect injuriously; to come or fall upon; to seize: said of diseases and other destructive agencies; as, yesterday he was attacked by fever; caries attacked the bones; the grub attacked the crops. Specifically—4. In chem. to begin to decompose or dissolve. [The word attack is of comparatively recent origin or introduction. It occurs in Milton but not in Shakespeare.] SYN. To assail, assault, invade, beset, besiege, beleague, combat, impugn, encounter.

Attack (at-tak'), v.i. To make an attack or onset; as, the enemy attacked with great boldness.

Those that attack generally get the victory. Rich. Kane.

Attack (at-tak'), n. 1. A falling on, with force or violence, or with calumny, satire, or criticism; an onset; an assault; a seizure by a disease; as, to make an attack upon the enemy; a calumnious attack upon a person; an attack of fever.—2. Battle generally; fight. [Rare.]

Long time in even scale

The battle hung; till Satan . . . ranging through the dire attack.
Saw where the sword of Michael smote, and fell'd Squadrons at once. Milton.

SYN. Assault, invasion, onset, inroad, charge. Attackable (at-tak'-a-bl), a. Capable of being attacked; assailable.

Attacker (at-tak'-er), n. One who attacks, assaults, or invades.

Attacottic (at-ta-kot'tik), a. Pertaining to the Attacottis, a tribe of ancient Britons, allies of the Scots. Pinkerton.

Attacque (at-tak'), v.t. To attack. Attagas, Attagen (at-ta-gas, at-ta-jen), n. [L. attagen, Gr. attagas, attagen.] A beautiful gallinaceous bird of the grouse family, the Syrhaptes Pallasi, allied to the sandgrouse and partridge, and resembling the pheasant, with a short black bill and a fine crest of yellow feathers, variegated with black and white spots. It is a native of the deserts of Central Asia, and is rarely met with in the south of Europe. It is the only species of the genus.

Attaghan (at-ta-gan), n. [See YATAGHAN.] A dagger-like sabre used by the Turks. More frequently written Yataghan.

Attain (at-tân'), v.t. [O Fr. atteindre, Fr. atteindre, attemper, L. attingo, to reach, come to, or overtake—ad, to, and tango, to touch. Attain, attainder, come from the same Latin word, while from simple tango come tact, tangent, &c.] 1. To reach by effort; to achieve or accomplish; to acquire; to gain: said of an end or object. 'Attain the wise indifference of the wise.' Tennyson.—2. To come to; to arrive at; to reach: said of a place.

Canaan he now attains. Milton.

3. To reach in excellence or degree; to equal. So the first precedent, if it be good, is seldom attained by imitation. Bacon.

4. To overtake; to come up with. 'Not attaining him in time.' Bacon.—Attain, Obtain, Procure. Attain differs from obtain and procure in that it involves the idea of considerable effort, while obtain does not necessarily imply effort at all, and procure only a small degree of it. Thus we may obtain an estate by inheritance, we may procure a book by loan or purchase, but we attain an end only by exertion. Inattention to this distinction has led even good writers into mistakes in the use of this word and its derivatives. See note under ATTAINABLE.—SYN. To reach, achieve, accomplish, acquire, obtain, procure, gain, get.

Attain (at-tân'), v.i. To reach; to come or arrive by motion, bodily or mental exertion, or efforts of any kind toward a place or object: followed by to or unto.

Such knowledge is too wonderful for me; it is high; I can not attain unto it. Ps. cxxxix. 6.

Attain (at-tân'), n. Something attained. Glanville.

Attainability (at-tân-a-bil'i-ti), n. Attainableness. Coleridge.

Attainable (at-tân-a-bl), a. Capable of being attained; capable of being reached by efforts of the mind or body; capable of being compassed or accomplished by efforts directed to the object; as, perfection is not attainable in this life. [From an inattention to the true sense of this word authors have very improperly used it for obtainable, procurable; as in the following passages: 'The kind and quality of food and liquor; the species of habitation, furniture, and clothing, to which the common people of each country are habituated, must be attainable with ease and certainty.' Paley. 'General Howe would not permit them to be purchased in Philadelphia, and they (clothes and blankets) were not attainable in the country.' Marshall's Life of Washington. In each case the word should be obtainable or procurable.]

Attainableness (at-tân-a-bl-ness), n. The quality of being attainable.

Attainder (at-tân-dér), n. [O Fr. atteindre, atteindre, to touch or reach, as with law; to attain, from L. attingo. See ATTAIN, v.t.] The idea of taint, stain, or corruption has been erroneously connected with this word. See ATTAIN, to affect with attainder. 1. The act of attainting or state of being attainted; the legal consequences of judgment of death or outlawry pronounced in respect of treason or felony; as, a bill of attainder; to remove an attainder. The consequences by the common law were, forfeiture of lands, tenements, and hereditaments, incapability of suing in a court of justice, or of performing any of the duties, or enjoying any of the privileges of a free citizen, and 'corruption of blood' rendering the party incapable of inheriting property or transmitting it to heirs. By 32 and 33 Vict. cxxiii. it is now provided that no conviction for treason or felony shall cause attainder or forfeiture.—2. A bringing under some disgrace, stain, or imputation; state of being in dishonour.

So to the laws at large I write my name:
And he that breaks them in the least degree
Stands in attainder of eternal shame. Shak.

Attainment (at-tân-tment), n. 1. The act of attaining; the act of arriving at or reaching; the act of obtaining by exertion or effort. 'The attainment of every desired object.' Sir W. Jones.—2. That which is attained or obtained by exertion; acquisition; acquirement; as, a man of great attainments.

Attaint (at-tânt'), v.t. [Fr. atteindre, to reach, as with law, to convict, pp. atteint;

O Fr. attaint, convicted. (See ATTAINER.) This word is generally, but erroneously, confounded with attaint, to disgrace.] 1. To affect with attainder; to find guilty of a crime, as of felony or treason, involving forfeiture of civil privileges.

I must offend before I be attainted. Shak.

Attaint (at-tânt'), n. 1. An ancient mode of inquiring whether a jury had given a false verdict, abolished by 4 Geo. IV. 1.—2. In old law, (a) a conviction; (b) impeachment.

Edmund, I arrest thee
On capital treason; and, in thine attaint.
This glided serpent. Shak.

[The folios and many modern editions read arrest instead of attaint in this passage.]

Attaint (at-tânt'), v.t. [Prefix at, from L. ad, to, and taint, from L. tinctus, pp. of tingo, to dye; Fr. teindre, pp. teint, stained. See TAINT.] 1. To disgrace; to cloud with infamy; to stain; to taint; to corrupt. 'Lest she with blame her honour should attaint.' Spenser.—2. To affect with any passion or emotion. 'This noble woman . . . attainted with extreme sorrow.' Trans. of Historia Anglica.

Attaint (at-tânt'), n. 1. A stain, spot, or taint; hence, a disgrace.

What simple thief brags of his own attaint? Shak.

2. Infection; injurious or deleterious action. 'The marrow-eating sickness whose attaint disorder breeds.' Shak.—3. A blow or wound on the hinder feet of a horse.

Attaint (at-tânt'), pp. 1. Tainted; corrupted; infected; attacked.

My tender youth was never yet attaint.

By any passion. Shak.

2. Attainted; convicted.

Attainture, Attainture (at-tânt-ment', at-tânt-ür), n. The act or state of being attainted or affected with attainder; conviction; arrest; impeachment. 'Cardinal Wolsey's attainture.' Aschmole.

Her attainture will be Humphrey's fall. Shak.

Attake, Atake, v.t. [Prefix a, and taks.] To overtake.

At Boughton under Blee us gan atake
A man, that clothed was in clothes blake. Chaucer.

Atal (at'al), n. [Corn.] Rubbish of mines or impure off-cast containing little or no ore; refuse. Called also Attile.

Attalea (at-ta-lé'a), n. [In allusion to the beauty of the trees, from Attalus, a rich king of Pergamos.] A genus of palms found chiefly in the tropical parts of America, distinguished by its nut containing three cells, each inclosing a single seed. The leaves are large and pinnate, form an excellent thatch, and are woven into hats, mats, and baskets. The fibres of the leaf-stalks of A. furcata are made into ropes and brooms and its hard nuts are the coquillita-nuts, which are 3 or 4 inches long, brown in colour, hard, and of sufficient thickness to be turned into door handles, small cups, &c.

Attame (at-tám'), v.t. To tame; to overcome. Sylvester.

Attame, v.t. [L. attamino, to attack. See ATTAMINE.] 1. To open; to broach.—2. To begin; to commence.—3. To taste; to feel.—4. To hurt; to injure. [Chaucer uses the word in all the above senses.]

Attamine (at-tam'in-át), v.t. [L. attamino, attaminatum, to touch, to attack, to contaminate—ad, to, and tamino, to violate, whence also contaminate.] To contaminate. Blount.

Attaque (at-tak'), v.t. To attack. Feltham. Attar (at'tár), n. [Ar. atr, Hind. utr, perfume.] In the East Indies, a general term for a perfume from flowers; in Europe generally used only of the attar or otto of roses, an essential oil made in Turkey and various other eastern countries from Rosa cinnamomifolia, the hundred-leaved or cabbage rose, R. damascena, or damask-rose, R. moschata, or musk-rose, &c., 100,000 roses yielding only 130 grains of attar. The oil is at first greenish, but afterwards it presents various tints of green, yellow, and red. In this country it is concrete at all ordinary temperatures, and becomes liquid about 84° Fahr. It is a well-known perfume, but the odour is agreeable only when diffused, being too powerful when it is concentrated.

Attark (at-task'), v.t. [Prefix a, and tark.] To task; to tax; to reprove; to blame.

You are much more attarked for want of wisdom than praised for harmful mildness. Shak.

Attaste, v.t. [Prefix a, and taste.] To taste. 'To attaste the cup.' Chaucer.

sary. A public attorney or attorney at law is a person qualified to appear for another before a court of law to prosecute or defend any action on behalf of his client. The term was formerly applied especially to those practising before the supreme courts of common law at Westminster, and corresponded to the term solicitor used in regard to the Courts of Chancery. As an attorney was almost invariably a solicitor, the two terms came to be generally regarded as synonymous. By the Judicature Act of 1873 all persons practising before the supreme courts at Westminster are now called solicitors. Attorneys or solicitors do not plead or argue in court on behalf of their clients, this being the part of the barristers or counsel; their special functions may be defined to be, to institute actions on behalf of their clients and take the necessary steps for defending them, to furnish counsel with the necessary materials to enable them to get up their pleadings, to practise conveyancing, to prepare legal deeds and instruments of all kinds, and generally to advise with and act for their clients in all matters connected with law. An attorney, whether private or public, may have general powers to act for another; or his power may be special, and limited to a particular act or acts. In Scotland there is no class of practitioners of the law who take the name of attorneys.—2. The name in the West Indies for the general supervisor or manager of plantations.—Letter, warrant, or power of attorney, an instrument by which one person authorizes another to do some act or acts for him, as to execute a deed, to collect rents or debts, to sell estates, &c.

Attractingly (at-trakt'ing-ly), adv. By way of attraction; so as to attract.

Attraction (at-trakt'shon), n. 1. The act, power, or property of attracting; specifically, (a) in physics, the tendency, force, or forces through which all particles of matter, as well as all individual masses of matter, are attracted or drawn towards each other; the inherent tendency in bodies to approach each other, to unite and to remain united. By attraction every body tends to the earth, and if raised from its surface falls to it again. The plumb-line, which is usually vertical, is deflected in the vicinity of a large mountain by the attraction of the mass. The moon is constantly drawn towards the earth; the earth and the other planets towards the sun. Attraction is exhibited in various ways, which has led to the use of various specific designations. When bodies tend to come together from sensible distances, that tendency is called either the attraction of gravitation, magnetism, or electricity, according to circumstances; when the surfaces of bodies in contact tend together, it is by adhesion; when the particles of the same body tend together, it is by cohesion; and when the particles of different bodies in contact tend together it is by affinity; the tendency of fluids to rise in fine tubes or in small interstices of porous bodies is called capillary attraction. See CAPILLARY, CHEMICAL, COHESION, ELECTRICITY, GRAVITATION, MAGNETISM. (b) The power or act of alluring, drawing to, inviting, or engaging; allurements; enticement; as, the attraction of beauty or eloquence.

Setting the attraction of my good parts aside, I have no other charm. Shak.

2. That which attracts; a charm; an allurements. 'Her sweet harmony and other chosen attractions.' Shak.

It is an attribute to God himself. Shak.

In logic, the word is sometimes used as equivalent to predicate; it is also sometimes restricted to an essential and inherent quality, something inseparable from the essence and individuality of the thing, thus unity, identity, and activity are attributes of the soul. Fleming.—2. In gram. the word that expresses what is affirmed concerning another, as an adjective; an attributive.—3. An epithet as descriptive of an attribute or quality, or of a combination of such. [Rare.]

'The heart-blood of beauty, love's invisible soul,' 'Who's my cousin Cressida?' 'No, sir, Helen; could you not find out that by her attributes?' Shak.

4. In the fine arts, a symbol of office or character added to any figure; thus the eagle is the attribute of Jupiter, a club of Hercules, the bow and arrow of Love, &c.

The ladder is a striking attribute for the patriarch Jacob, and the harp for King David. Fairholt.

5. † Reputation; honour.

Much attribute he hath, and much the reason why we ascribe it to him. Shak.

Attribution (at-trib'üt'shon), n. 1. The act of attributing.—2. That which is ascribed; attribute; function.

It is not desirable that to the ever-growing attributions of the government so delicate a function should be superadded. J. S. Mill.

3. † Commendation; praise.

If speaking truth
In this fine age were not thought flattery,
Such attribution should the Douglas have,
As not a soldier of this season's stamp
Should go so general current through the world. Shak.

Attributive (at-trib'üt-iv), a. Pertaining to or expressing an attribute; as, an attributive word.

Attributive (at-trib'üt-iv), n. In gram. a word expressive of an attribute.

EAR 1. In bot. a garden flower derived from the yellow Primula Auricula, found native in the Swiss Alps, and sometimes called bear's ear from the shape of its leaves. It has for centuries been an object of cultivation by florists, who have succeeded in raising from seed a great number of beautiful varieties. — 2. In zool. a genus of phytophagous or plant-eating gasteropodous molluscs, whose organs of respiration are formed for breathing air.

Auricular (a-rik'-u-lar), a. [From L. auricula, the ear. See AURICULA.] 1. Pertaining to the ear or the sense of hearing, as, the auricular nerves. — 2. Confined to one's ear, especially privately confined to the ear of a priest, as, auricular confession. 3. Recognised by the ear; known or obtained by the sense of hearing; as, auricular evidence.
